What Obama got right, and wrong

Yossi Klein Halevi
Special to The CJN

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu makes a point to the media last September at the White House with U.S. President Barack Obama standing alongside. The two men met last Friday at the White House to discuss reactions to the president's speech on the Mideast.

It was a nation of ambivalent Israelis that listened to U.S. President Barack Obama's latest Middle East plan – an interim agreement based on ending the occupation of the Palestinians while somehow ensuring the security of the Israelis.

Israeli ambivalence is peculiar: it has nothing to do with uncertainty or confusion. Instead, to be an ambivalent Israeli is to be torn between two conflicting certainties. As an ambivalent Israeli, I know that a Palestinian state is an existential necessity for me – saving Israel from the untenable choice between being a Jewish and a democratic state, from the moral erosion of occupation, from the growing movement to again turn the Jews, via the Jewish state, into the symbol of evil.

But I also know that a Palestinian state is an existential threat to me—forcing Israel back into eight-mile-wide borders between Palestine and the Mediterranean Sea, with the centre of the country vulnerable to rocket attacks from the West Bank hills that overlook it. And, if Tel Aviv were to become the next Sderot – the Israeli town on the Gaza border that has endured thousands of missile attacks following the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza in 2005 – the international community might well try to prevent us from defending ourselves against terrorists embedded in a civilian population, with all the consequences of asymmetrical warfare.

Moreover, a generation of Palestinians has been raised to see Israelis as Nazis, thieves, inventors of a history not rooted in this land. Alone among national movements, only the Palestinian cause conditions its dream of statehood on the disappearance of another state. (And that is the dream that not only Hamas but Fatah, too, actively incites in internal Palestinian discourse.) Alone among occupiers, only Israel fears that territorial withdrawal won't merely diminish but destroy it.

And so, there were two sides of me listening to the president. The dovish side embraced his vision of an interim agreement that would leave the issues of Jerusalem and refugee return to a later stage and instead focus on ending the occupation and providing security guarantees. But the hawkish side of me wondered whether this president has learned anything about the Middle East.

I listened in disbelief as he stated that, while there are those who believe that the regional instability of recent months makes a solution impossible for now, he believes the opposite is true. On what basis, Mr. President? From where I'm sitting in Jerusalem – watching Turkey turn Islamist and pro-Iranian, Lebanon being devoured by Hezbollah, Hamas legitimized by Fatah, the Muslim Brotherhood rising in Egypt, and Iran's nuclear program proceeding apace – I would say that this is just about the worst time to try to entice an ambivalent Israeli into empowering his dovish side. At a time when Egyptian-Israeli relations – our only successful land for peace agreement – could be unravelling, Israelis are hardly likely to risk another withdrawal, this time from our most sensitive border, and without even the pretense of a peace agreement.

So, yes to the vision. But no, we can't implement it anytime soon. In other words: yes, we can't.

In fact, by the standards that Obama himself set in his speech – insistence on Hamas' recognition of Israel, rejection of Palestinian unilateralist moves toward statehood at the United Nations – we can't even get to the negotiating table, let alone negotiate a solution.

New CEO Named

EDMONTON — The Jewish Federation of Edmonton has named Russ Joseph as its new chief executive officer. Joseph, who had been serving as the federation's temporary CEO since the beginning of the year, officially took the helm May 1. He will also be CEO of the city's Jewish Community Charitable Foundation and executive director of the Jewish community centre. Joseph is a longtime federation board member and past president.

WORLD

Brit Ban On Ballot

SAN FRANCISCO — A measure seeking to ban male circumcision will appear on the November ballot in San Francisco. More than 7,700 signatures from city residents on a petition supporting the measure were approved by city officials May 18. The measure, which would apply only in San Francisco, would make it a misdemeanour crime to circumcise boys under 18. The maximum penalty would be a year in jail and a $1,000 fine. Circumcisions would be permitted only for medical reasons, with no religious exemptions. Even if the measure passes, it would likely be challenged as a constitutional violation of religious freedom. Jewish groups oppose the measure.

Sign Repaired

WARSAW — The "Arbeit Macht Frei" sign stolen from Auschwitz and cut into three pieces has been repaired. The iron sign was unveiled May 18 in the laboratory of the camp museum. Repairs to the 16-foot-long sign, which means "work makes you free," took several months. It was stolen from the former Nazi death camp in December 2009 and recovered elsewhere in Poland 72 hours later, cut in three pieces. A copy has been placed above the entrance gate. The repaired sign will likely become part of a new exhibit. Five Polish men were convicted of carrying out the theft for a Swedish neo-Nazi who was a middleman for another buyer.

Amnesty Urged

WARSAW — Belgium's Senate voted to accept draft legislation that would give amnesty to Nazi collaborators. The legislation, initiated by the far-right Flemish Vlaams Belang party, was approved this month. In debating it, Belgian Justice Minister Stefaan De Clerck of the ruling Christian Democrats reportedly supported the amnesty and suggested that the country should "maybe also forget because this is in the past." Belgium's Jewish community expressed dismay at De Clerck's suggestion.

Record Falafel Ball

LOS ANGELES — A falafel ball weighing nearly 53 pounds created at a Jewish food festival in California was certified as the world's largest. It was certified May 15 for submission to the Guinness Book of World Records at the Santa Clarita Valley Jewish Food and Cultural Festival. The previous Guinness record falafel ball, created by an Israeli chef in New York, was 24 pounds.

Swedish Queen Probes Father's Nazi Ties

STOCKHOLM — Sweden's Queen Silvia has ordered an investigation into her father's links to the Nazis.

The German-born queen "has taken the initiative to gather the facts concerning the activities of Walter Sommerlath in Brazil and Germany between 1930 and 1940," the royal court said in a statement.

Queen Silvia

Walter Sommerlath died in 1990. He was a Nazi party member, although the queen said he wasn't politically active and joined to save his career.

Last fall, a Swedish TV station investigating Sommerlath's Nazi past reported he took over a Jewish-owned German factory in 1939, as part of a Nazi program of Aryanization. The queen issued a denial after the broadcast.

Silvia Sommerlath met Carl XVI Gustaf, who became the King of Sweden, at the 1972 Munich Olympics, where she was an interpreter. They married in 1976.

CEO takes leave after 27 years with Congress

Farber gets set to run in Ontario election

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

It's official.

Canadian Jewish Congress is losing its longtime CEO this month to the Liberal Party of Ontario.

Bernie Farber, the man known to most Canadians as the face and voice of Congress – he's worked for the organization for the past 27 years and has been its CEO since 2005 – announced this week he's going to run for the party as its candidate in the riding of Thornhill in the October provincial election.

He'll be up against the riding's Conservative incumbent, Peter Shurman.

Speaking to The CJN this month, Shurman, a former broadcaster, said he thought Farber was "a good guy" and wished him luck on his campaign, but said he wasn't concerned "in the slightest" by his rival's entry into politics.

In an interview at Congress' offices last week, Farber said he plans to run his campaign without any mudslinging and with "civility."

He said his decision to leave Congress and pursue a career in politics was something he had always contemplated, but never had the opportunity to explore before.

Farber said earlier this year that he was approached by "people" in the Liberal party to run in Thornhill. After some soul-searching and a conversation with his wife, he decided the "stars had aligned" and he made the decision to jump into politics.

Asked whether his decision was precipitated by the impending restructuring of Congress by the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), its controlling umbrella organization, Farber replied: "People are going to make all sorts of speculations. I want it to be clear: this is something I've wanted to do for a long time. That [my decision] comes at a time when we're going through a reorganization is more happenstance than anything else."

He added that he is taking a leave of absence from Congress to run in the election, and while he intends to win, if he fails in his bid for the Thornhill seat, he's "ready, willing and able to come back in a senior professional role in a new re-org."

What exactly that role would be is still in question.

Busy days for Israelis

From the editor's desk...

These words were written in Israel last week on May 17 before U.S. President Barack Obama delivered his major policy-address on the Middle East and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict on Thursday, before he met with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Friday and before he spoke to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) convention on Sunday.

They were also written before Netanyahu's scheduled historic address to both houses of the American Congress two days ago on Tuesday but after his peace framework speech last week on Monday to the Knesset.

But by the time these words were put to electronic paper so to speak, it had already been a very busy week for the Jewish state's security forces and diplomats.

The annual Nakba (Catastrophe) day demonstrations were conducted throughout Israel by the Palestinians.

Netanyahu spoke to the people through his speech to the Knesset.

Wise to the ways of manipulating events and the media, Iran orchestrated a "Nakba" riot on the Lebanese border with Israel in which a number of Lebanese were killed. As of this writing it was not clear whether they were killed by Israeli or Lebanese soldiers.

Wise, too, in his own way to the benefit of steering media attention away from the brutalization of his own people, Syrian dictator Bashar Assad staged a "peaceful" assault on the international border with Israel in the Golan Heights near Majdal Shams.

Wiser yet and craftier still in the ways of prevarication, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas authored an op-ed article that was published in the New York Times in which he "called on all friendly, peace-loving nations to join us in realizing our national aspirations by recognizing the State of Palestine on the 1967 border and by supporting its admission to the United Nations."

Finally, Obama met at the White House with King Abdullah of Jordan to brief the king – whose country is heavily subsidized by the United States, but essentially "protected" by Israel – on the president's upcoming policy speech.

Media outlets in Israel strained to keep up with the dizzying pace of unfolding events. Israelis themselves were, simply, dizzy by the sound and fury. There were very heated exchanges on television among politicians, experts and political analysts, each certain that the other was wrong.

The Nakba day demonstrations inside Israel made very little news compared to the border incursions. Israelis were stunned and quite unsettled by the relative ease with which the Syrian protesters breached the border fence.

The very large question that hovered over Israel the day after the border incident was: what happens next time? What if thousands of people rather than hundreds rush the fence?

The editor of the Jerusalem Post concisely framed the worrisome question. "What is the IDF [Israel Defence Forces] to do if the same tactic of attempted en masse infiltration is repeated in the weeks and months ahead, but instead of a few hundred infiltrators, the borders are overrun with thousands or tens of thousands of Palestinian 'refugees' and their supporters?"

As of this writing, most Israelis were concerned and some quite worried about the content of Obama's May 19 speech. He gave a tritely perfunctory statement to the press after his meeting with King Abdullah reminding Israelis and Palestinians of the need to return to the negotiating table. He blithely avoided the irritating fact that the Israelis have been pleading for direct negotiations for nearly two years.

Netanyahu, it seemed, by the school-yard heckling during his speech inside the Knesset and by the billowy huffing and puffing outside the Knesset, pleased no one with his remarks, either. Some of his own Likud party members were his fiercest critics, appalled by the prime minister's public suggestion before the full Knesset plenary that Israel would withdraw from areas in the West Bank that were not included in the major settlement blocs.

"We agree that we have to keep the settlement blocs. There is broad consensus that the settlement blocs must remain within the State of Israel," Netanyahu said.

One of the most important domestic objectives of Netanyahu's peace-making policies is to maintain a broad base of support for them among Israelis, or, in the words of one Israeli taxi driver, "to keep the consensus intact."

One of the most important objectives of Netanyahu's speech to Congress was to win the support of a majority of the American people for the security of the Jewish state and, in particular, his approach to ensuring it. Mainstream European support may already be lost.

These are pressing and important times for Israelis. They know it. And they show it.

Conflict-of-interest czar dedicated to public service

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

His may not be a household name, but Sidney B. Linden, Ontario's conflict of interest commissioner, has dedicated his life to justice and the betterment of the province.

Born in Toronto to Polish-Jewish immigrants who "weren't big on officialdom," Linden was raised to fight for the underdog and for justice, he told The CJN in a recent interview.

Sidney B. Linden

And what a fight he's waged.

After a stellar high school basketball career – he helped his Bathurst Heights Secondary School team win the 1955 championship – he went on to study law at the University of Toronto and was called to the bar in 1966.

Now 72, Linden has been a stalwart supporter of Ontario's justice system, and his reputation as a trustworthy and fair-minded man has attracted job offers from numerous Ontario politicians and bureaucrats over the years.

"I just now have been able to put my head around all the stuff I've done," Linden marvelled during an interview in his downtown office.

As a lawyer and legal adviser, Linden has played a role in the municipal and provincial realms as the first police complaints commissioner for Toronto; as executive director of the Canadian Auto Workers prepaid legal services plan (the first of its kind in Canada), and in 1987 as Ontario's first information and privacy commissioner.

In 1990, Linden was appointed Chief Justice of the Ontario Court of Justice. Later, in 1999, he served as the chair of Legal Aid Ontario.

And from 2003 to 2007, he was the commissioner of the Ipperwash Inquiry into the death of native protester Dudley George at the hands of the OPP.

While he's proud of all his service to the province, Linden said he never specifically sought out any one job, they just "kind of overlapped."

What draws him to every appointment is its level of difficulty, he said.

"I get excited by challenge," Linden said, noting that in almost all his roles, he's had to reform or restructure the organizations he's been asked to head.

"One of my sons is an architect and he tells me I'm like one too… [in that] I build institutions."

For instance, he said, as an outgrowth of his recommendations to the government after Ipperwash, the province set up the standalone Ministry of Aboriginal Affairs.

Linden joked that after his intense Ipperwash experience – the stress of which he likened to "walking across the 401 blindfolded" – he was ready to "find a nice place in Greece on a beach to restore my sanity."

Being the restless soul that he is, that idea didn't last very long. Instead, he said, the province called on his expertise yet again, this time to start up a new agency in 2007 – his current home at the office of the conflict of interest commissioner.

That office advises politicians and public servants on the boundaries between their public roles and their private activities.

"I love this job," he said. "I feel almost like a rabbi. Deputies and ministers ask me what's right and wrong, what they can and can't do. On occasion, I go back and talk to my own rabbi, [Beth Tzedec Congregation's] Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, to ask his advice, too."

But Linden relies mainly on his own counsel when making these decisions and dispensing advice, he said.

Asked how his Judaism plays a role in his decision-making, Linden said it "plays into everything."

He said there is a "general theological aspect" to his role as the conflict of interest commissioner.

"A lot of this is common sense. But sometimes common sense isn't so common," he quipped.

And he's quick to defend the work Ontario public servants do and readily extols their virtues.

"Public service in Ontario is revered in the rest of the world," Linden said. "I've been all over, and people can't believe how good our system is. There's a great tradition of honourable public service [in Ontario]. All the good stuff we do doesn't often get recognized. Only when someone screws up does it get noticed. But the public service in Ontario is first-rate."

When he's not working, which is rare, Linden said he enjoys travelling with his wife and playing with his grandchildren.

Not surprisingly, he's also an information junkie.

"I read six newspapers every day," he said. "I have an eclectic curiosity, and there are very few things I'm not interested in."

Linden said he feels "blessed" by the life he's led so far and has no regrets about any of his work.

"When you reach this stage in life and can look back without regrets, that's a blessing. This makes me a very happy man."

Canadians to scale majestic Kilimanjaro

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

This summer, four Torontonians will join a group of 20 Americans, Africans and Israelis on a climb up Mount Kilimanjaro to raise $1 million for Save a Child's Heart (SACH).

SACH, an Israeli-based international humanitarian project that provides free cardiac care for children suffering from life-threatening heart disease, has organized the event called Climb Your Heart Out.

Ottawa-native Daphne Algom, a journalist and former producer for CNN and ABC News who is working to promote SACH and the Aug. 8 climb, said that the $1 million they hope to raise will save the lives of 100 African children suffering from heart disease.

"At the mountain's summit, the climbers will make a declaration of their commitment to the idea that every child deserves the best medical treatment available, regardless of the child's nationality, religion, colour, gender or financial situation," Algom said, adding that each climber is responsible for raising a minimum of $10,000 – the cost of one heart surgery.

Israeli doctors who volunteer with SACH, founded by Dr. Ami Cohen in 1995 after he made aliyah from the United States, have performed life-saving surgeries on more than 2,600 children from some of the poorest areas in the world, including Africa, West Bank, Gaza, Jordan and Iraq.

SACH has an agreement with the Wolfson Medical Center near Tel Aviv that permits volunteer surgeons to use the hospital's facilities, provided SACH covers the costs of performing the surgery.

SACH also brings in doctors from developing countries for heart-surgery training and organizes surgical missions abroad.

"Directly prior to the climb, Save a Child's Heart will hold a surgical and teaching mission at Bugando Medical Center in Mwanza, Tanzania, for eight to 10 local children desperately in need of cardiac care," Algom said.

"One of the doctors on the climb and doing the surgical mission, Dr. Godwin Godfrey, is a Tanzanian being trained by SACH in Israel."

Planning a fundraiser around an eight-day climb up Africa's highest mountain pays homage to Cohen, who died in 2001 during his own climb up Mount Kilimanjaro.

SACH volunteer Debra Silver, a Toronto native who made aliyah in 1973 but spends her summers in Toronto, said that when Cohen tragically died, she wondered if his vision would die with him.

Save a Child's Heart volunteer Debra Silver, bottom right, with Israeli doctors, Sion Houri, standing, and Alona Raucher.

"I really didn't know whether this organization would continue or could continue without his leadership," said Silver, who sits on SACH's board of directors and will be participating in the climb.

"I think it's amazing – the team that he created, the people who have kept his vision alive and who are still bringing it to a higher level every day."

Silver, who will be celebrating her 56th birthday the day before the climb, said that since 2006, she has travelled to China, Maldova, Zanzibar and Mwanza to witness the surgical missions and "get to know the real work and the real heroes."

She said she's looking forward to returning to the same hospital she visited in Mwanza in 2008, and is preparing herself physically for the ascent.

Although Silver isn't an experienced climber, she said the 49-kilometre Machame Route isn't too strenuous and her excitement is overriding her anxiety.

"I think that the name Kilimanjaro has so much magic for me. I thought about the climb, and as I understand it, physically, it's not such difficult climbing. It's not like we're climbing a rock wall. It's more like a hike," she said.

"I don't necessarily have a need to get to the summit... I will go as far as I am able. Just being on the mountain is enough for me to be able to say that I did it," she added with a laugh.

Silver, who joined the SACH team in 1996, just a year after it was founded, said the organization continues to impress her 15 years later.

"As an organization, it's amazing what has been done, what needs to be done. When I look at other major hospitals that have a similar program, but nothing near the scope of the Israeli program, I'm even more proud."

Jewish MP named to cabinet

Neophyte Conservative MP Joe Oliver's win in Toronto's Eglinton-Lawrence riding against Liberal incumbent Joe Volpe in this month's federal election has apparently won him favour with Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Joe Oliver

Last week, Harper announced his new cabinet and Oliver was appointed minister of natural resources.

As one of only three Jewish MPs in the new Parliament – Conservative MP for York Centre Mark Adler and stalwart Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler are the others – Oliver takes over an important portfolio despite his rookie status.

Peter Kent

In related news, Peter Kent, Conservative MP for Thornhill, the riding with the country's largest proportion of Jewish voters, retained his post as environment minister.

The CJN will have interviews with both Oliver and Kent in an upcoming issue.

Enough to lies

The State of Israel is 63 years old. But it is still fighting a war for its independence. To the great disgrace of the United Nations, the Jewish state is the only member of that body whose right to be there, since the first moment of its birth, continues to be rejected and undermined. Indeed, a large cadre of its members, led by such humanitarian avatars as Iran and Syria, openly, actively and relentlessly attempt to destroy the only Jewish state on earth.

The constant, cynical and shameless use of brazen lies has been one of the chief instruments of the campaign to bring down the Jewish state.

Israel's enemies have been as deft as they have been sinister. Their lies have been propagated from the rostrums of the loftiest diplomatic arenas, as well as in university lecture halls, by leaders of government as well as by racists and genocidalists, by the deliberately deceiving as well as by the innocently exploited.

The latest high profile, in-your-face, unembarrassed use of the anti-Israel lie by a well-known public figure happened last week. The New York Times published a plea by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas for the world's support for his planned unilateral declaration of an independent Palestinian state.

That the essay is self-serving in its content and obsequious in its tone is not surprising. The PA leader is an experienced, disingenuous manipulator of opportunity and audience. But his aversion to truth found an even more hideous embrace in the Times essay last week. (See According to Reports in this edition of The CJN.)

"It is important to note that the last time the question of Palestinian statehood took center stage at the General Assembly, the question posed to the international community was whether our homeland should be partitioned into two states. In November 1947, the General Assembly made its recommendation and answered in the affirmative. Shortly thereafter, Zionist forces expelled Palestinian Arabs to ensure a decisive Jewish majority in the future state of Israel, and Arab armies intervened. War and further expulsions ensued" (our emphasis).

Abbas wrote many lies in the essay, especially about the PA and its record these past 20 years in pursuing peace, but the twisting by 180 degrees of the events of 1947-1948 in the above passage is repulsive for its sneering contempt of people and truth.

We must not, we will not allow the lies to stand: lies that deny the Holocaust, lies that brand the Jewish state apartheid, and now lies about the founding of the Jewish state, lies that, over time, would infect the world of truth, like flesh-eating bacteria destroying the muscle and the sinew of the historical record on which civilization stands and its advancement relies.

It is time to say enough. We will not let lies go unanswered.

British prime minister Margaret Thatcher made an official visit to Israel, the first by an incumbent British prime minister since Israel's founding in 1948. In statements before and during the trip, she made it clear that her visit should not be interpreted as a diplomatic chilling of London's relations with Arab states.

Jews who are hostile to Israel

Most of the time I like what Rabbi Dow Marmur has to say in his CJN column, but not in "Thinking American" (May 12). Can one be an "ardent Zionist," as we are told about Rabbi Rick Jacobs, who is at the same time in a leadership position for the New Israel Fund (NIF)? The NIF supports the Coalition of Women for Peace, one of the leading organizations in the global boycotts, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel. Is Zionism compatible with boycotts and sanctions against Israel? I don't think so.

Can one be a Zionist whose fundamental demand is for one-sided additional concessions by Israel? That's pretty much the sum total of J-Street's policies, regardless of how they are disguised and rationalized. Can one be a Zionist if one insists on policies without taking account of the risks and dangers to Israel of such previous concessions, which unfortunately J-Street ignores? I don't think so.

Can one be pro-Israel and at the same time rely on U.S. President Barack Obama to "promote his own Israeli-Palestinian peace plan" as New Yorker writer David Remnick would like – the same Obama who doesn't believe that Jews have a historical connection and right to the Land of Israel? And the same Obama whose Israeli approval rating is about four per cent? Can one be counted as pro-Israel if the vast majority of Israelis don't trust the engineer of the proposed policy? I don't think so.

What Rabbi Marmur sees emerging in some parts of the American Jewish community, to my mind, is a throwback to the days when many Jews were anti-Israel, especially so among Reform Judaism's leadership. But today it is too crude for Jews to openly identify themselves as hostile to Israel. Instead, they identify themselves as pro-Israel and/or Zionists, but disguise their hostility – even perhaps from themselves—in what looks like respectable organizations, although their proposals are distinctly hostile.

Neutral leadership to partisan position

Regarding Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber running in the upcoming Ontario election, why did Congress and its parent organizations fail to institute rules and contractual safeguards preventing this sort of jump of their most publicly visible employee from a trusted neutral leadership position representing community interests to an openly partisan position with no alignment with community interests ("Congress CEO to run for Liberals: reports," May 12)?

In government, it's a prohibited conflict of interest for senior public servants to jump ship to outside concerns they were previously involved with, until a decent time has passed, typically at least 12 months. Such moves bring government into disrepute by raising irresolvable questions whether private or partisan considerations may actually or apparently compromise the public interest either before or after the move. The same principle applies to community "governments."

To the public, Farber is the voice of the Jewish community. His move could throw up a murky cloud of potential partisanship and raise irresolvable questions bringing the neutrality of community governance into contention. Community agencies must be responsible stewards. If they are unable to prevent the current move, they must at least institute clear measures to prevent such moves in future.

Jews for Jesus uses subtle means

I recently attended a bar mitzvah in Wimbledon, England. The boy's mother saw a beautiful tallit online and ordered it. At the rehearsal, the rabbi noticed something unusual in the Hebrew writing on the tallit. On closer, examination, she realized it was writing from the New Testament and contained references to Jews for Jesus. A new tallit was purchased for the bar mitzvah. In her sermon, the rabbi made a point of telling the congregation about this incident and recommended that one should be wary of such purchases. She also suggested this information should be passed on to alert anyone wishing to purchase online. It appears Jews for Jesus are using subtle means to promote their cause.

Obama granted Netanyahu diplomatic victory

Aluf Benn
©Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu could feel satisfied while flying to Washington last week. U.S. President Barack Obama has granted Netanyahu a major diplomatic victory.

In return for his call for the establishment of a Palestinian state based on 1967 borders with agreed land swaps, without defining the size of these lands, Obama accepted Netanyahu's demands for strict security arrangements and a gradual, continuous withdrawal from the West Bank.

He suggested beginning negotiations on borders and security arrangements, and delaying discussions on the core issues such as Jerusalem and refugees.

More importantly, Obama scornfully rejected the Palestinian initiative to attain recognition at the United Nations and to isolate Israel, demanded the Palestinians return to negotiations, and called on Hamas to recognize Israel's right to exist. These points came straight out of the policy pages of the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem. Netanyahu could not have asked for more: Obama outright rejects Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' recognition campaign, as well as the Palestinian reconciliation agreement.

It seems that the new Fatah-Hamas unity has saved Netanyahu from a much more aggressive and binding speech on the part of Obama.

His approach to Israel was empathetic, not only with his reassurance of the U.S. commitment to Israel's security but also with his attempt "to save Israel from itself." Obama warned us that if we perpetuated the occupation, we shall crash due to our demographic inferiority, new military technology, and most importantly, due to the anger of the masses who are slowly gaining power in the surrounding countries. In order to retain the vision of a Jewish and democratic state, Israel must end the occupation and withdraw from the West Bank.

The points of the speech were surely pleasing to Netanyahu's ears. Obama promised he won't force a deal on Israel and the Palestinians and demanded both sides to return to negotiations. He did not condemn, as he did before, the Israeli settlements in the territories as "illegitimate" and did not demand a settlement freeze. He only reminded, in a critical tone, that Israel continues building settlements, as an explanation for the deadlock in peace talks.

Netanyahu will have to reply to Obama by accepting the principle of "1967 borders with agreed land swaps." He made a step toward that direction in his speech in the Knesset last week, when he talked about preserving settlement blocs, which is the same thing in Israeli wording.

Netanyahu essentially has no choice: after Obama accepted his procedural and security demands, he cannot remain apathetic to the U.S. president's suggestion regarding borders. But Netanyahu has nothing to worry about – there is no chance the Palestinian leadership will agree to return to negotiations under these principles.

Tensions were high in Israel last week as protesters from Syria last week destroyed the border fence near Majdal Shams in Israel. They were commemorating the Nakba, the disaster of Israel's creation. In his speech last week, U.S. President Barack Obama gave broad proposals for resolving the long-standing simmering issues between the Palestinians and the Israelis. [Israel Sun photo]

Is president disconnected from Israel's reality?

©Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — U.S. President Barack Obama does not understand the reality of Israel's situation, a senior Israeli official said on Friday, just as Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu arrived in Washington, D.C., ahead of his meeting with the American president.

In a high-profile Middle East policy speech on Thursday, Obama supported continued Mideast peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians based on 1967 borders, a move that caught Israeli leaders by surprise and drew criticism from Netanyahu and his aides.

"There is a feeling that Washington does not understand the reality, doesn't understand what we face," the official said on board the plane taking Netanyahu to Washington for talks later in the day with Obama.

"The prime minister's tough response expresses the disappointment with the absence of central issues that Israel demanded, chiefly the refugee [issue]," he added.

Tensions between Israel and the United States, already strained by a lengthy stall in Mideast peace talks, seemed to reach fever pitch following Obama's speech, and ahead of Netanyahu's planned address to Congress this week.

Earlier Friday, the New York Times reported that the American president had told his close aides that he did not believe that Netanyahu would be able to make the concessions necessary to strike a peace deal that would end the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

That comment came after Netanyahu, apparently taken aback by Obama's consent to a Palestinian state within 1967 borders, said Thursday that Israel would object to any withdrawal to "indefensible" borders, adding he expected Washington to allow it to keep major settlement blocs in any peace deal.

In a statement after Obama's speech outlining Middle East strategy, Netanyahu said before heading to Washington that "the viability of a Palestinian state cannot come at the expense of Israel's existence."

"That is why Prime Minister Netanyahu expects to hear a reaffirmation from President Obama of U.S. commitments made to Israel in 2004," the statement added, alluding to a previous letter from Washington suggesting Israel could keep larger settlement blocs as part a peace deal with the Palestinians.

"Israel appreciates President's Obama commitment to peace," Netanyahu said, but stressed that he expects Obama to refrain from demanding that Israel withdraw to "indefensible" 1967 borders, "which will leave a large population of Israelis in Judea and Samaria and outside Israel's borders."

Meanwhile, Obama's backing of a key Palestinian demand on the borders of its future state will help win UN recognition of a Palestinian state, Egypt's UN ambassador said Thursday.

Maged Abdelaziz linked Obama's support for the borders that existed before the 1967 Arab-Israeli war to the Palestinian campaign to get two-thirds of the UN General Assembly — at least 128 of its 192 member states — to recognize Palestine as a state by September.

He predicted the Palestinians would get support from at least 130 nations, which would be "a milestone," and would keep pursuing additional recognitions.

But for a newly created Palestine to become a member of the United Nations, Abdelaziz said, it must get support from the Security Council, where the United States, Israel's closest ally, has veto power.

"If they put a resolution in the General Assembly requesting the Security Council to recognize the state of Palestine and this resolution passes ... with 170 or 180 votes, I'm sure that this is going to put a lot of moral pressure on the Security Council, and particularly on the United States, in order not to veto," Abdelaziz told a group of reporters.

He welcomed Obama's support for the pre-1967 borders with "mutually agreed swaps" of land because it "runs in conjunction with the efforts by the Palestinian leadership to garner the most possible number of recognitions of the state of Palestine on the borders of 1967, with those swaps."

But the Egyptian ambassador said Obama missed an opportunity to address other key issues, including Israel's continued settlement activities, water, ending the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the return of refugees "which is a critical issue," and the Palestinian demand for east Jerusalem as its capital.

The Palestinians insist they will not resume peace talks until Israel stops building settlements in the West Bank and east Jerusalem – lands it captured in the 1967 war and which the Palestinians want for their future state.

Israel maintains that the Palestinians should not be setting conditions for talks and that settlements didn't stop them negotiating in the past.

Egypt mediated talks between Fatah and Hamas that led to the agreement on a unity government, he said, and it is trying to ensure that the reconciliation is not just symbolic.

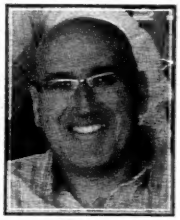
"We're putting a lot of emphasis on Hamas changing its positions in order to join the peace process and to stop all kinds of activities that it's doing against it," Abdelaziz said.

He said this means having Hamas accept the principles outlined by the Quartet of Mideast mediators – the UN, the United States, European Union and Russia – which include recognition of Israel and honouring all past agreements with the Jewish state.

It's time for Netanyahu to lead, not wait

Almost 40 years ago Abba Eban, considered by many the father of Israeli statesmanship, eloquently observed that the "Arabs never miss an opportunity to miss an opportunity." Regrettably, lately, that oft-quoted citation seems also aptly attributable to Israel.

In June 2009, 2-1/2 months after becoming prime minister for the second time, Benjamin Netanyahu made a major policy speech at Bar-Ilan University. He committed his government to a two-state solution with the Palestinians. While building in West Bank settlements would continue, to provide for their natural growth, and a united Jerusalem would forever remain the country's capital, Netanyahu envisioned a Jewish Israel co-existing peacefully with a demilitarized Palestine as its neighbour.



This was an important turnaround for a man known for his hawkish views and as a traditional supporter of a "Greater Israel." Netanyahu's new vision seemed to provide a springboard for renewed peace talks with the Palestinians.

However, from the get-go, Netanyahu's speech was viewed by Palestinians (and others) as a non-starter. The many reservations he sewed into the fabric of a future demilitarized Palestinian state left very little wiggle room. And they didn't believe his leftward swing was sincere.

Soon after his election, U.S. President Barack Obama appointed George Mitchell, a former U.S. senator and acclaimed diplomat, as his special envoy for Middle East peace. Mitchell made numerous trips to the area and even brought Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to Washington, D.C., last

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

September in a failed attempt to jump-start direct negotiations.

Mitchell's resignation on May 13, just a week before Netanyahu's latest visit to Washington and Obama's planned policy address on the Mideast, signifies the hopelessness of the present situation after two years without any real progress and neither side making overtures that might advance true dialogue.

In the months preceding Netanyahu's latest jaunt to D.C., it was said he'd be making further groundbreaking policy statements while there. Instead, as other events unfolded in our region, Netanyahu used their occurrence to justify a strategy of doing nothing, of waiting.

But while Israel has been sitting idly by, the Palestinians haven't. The PA, under Abbas' leadership and, more appreciably and adroitly, the leadership of western-trained Prime Minister Sallam Fayyad, has made noteworthy economic and security inroads in the West Bank and has reinforced legitimate institutions of what they perceive as a future Palestinian state.

The PA has also been active diplomatically. Several South American countries have already recognized a Palestinian state. More significantly, the Palestinians have set the groundwork for a successful United Nations General Assembly resolution recognizing a Palestinian state this fall, the ramifications of which are still unknown, but certainly won't make Israel's position internationally any easier.

Add to this the recent reconciliation agreement forced upon the PLO and Hamas by the new interim regime in Egypt and by what appears to be the Palestinian street's desire for unity between the factions. Whether or not this understanding is doomed, given the enmity between the two sides, one cannot underestimate the power of the Palestinian masses to affect this matter, buoyed by the Arab Spring spreading throughout the region.

And on May 15, the day Palestinians commemorate the nakba, the catastrophe they claim befell them with the establishment of a Jewish state on that day in 1948, Israel got a foretaste of Facebook people power when thousands of Palestinian civilians broke down fences on the Syrian border and hundreds infiltrated the Golan Heights. On the same day, thousands more attempted to do the same from Lebanon and Gaza and demonstrations, sometimes violent, took place inside Israel and the West Bank.

With all these events and more, Netanyahu and his advisers are behaving like ostriches, burying their heads in the sand in the vain hope they'll re-emerge into a world that understands that Israel alone is in the right.

That won't happen.

It's time Israel started leading instead of being led. A bona fide initiative, not just posturing, is needed. Netanyahu must state what he's truly willing to do to advance the peace process. Say "yes, but" rather than "no."

It won't be easy and will include painful compromises. But let's grab the opportunity before it, too, disappears.

We need real leadership, now. I'm afraid we might not have it.

Wouldn't it be good to have Abba Eban around for some guidance and direction.

Nakba myth stands in the way of peace

According to the standard mythology of the Arab-Israeli conflict, found in most university campuses, on the pages of the New York Times and the Globe and Mail, and in diplomatic talk-shops, settlements are the major obstacles to peace. End the post-1967 "occupation" and create an instant Palestinian state, say these all-knowing analysts, and the conflict will be over.

In contrast, every year, on May 15, the Palestinians and numerous allies send the world exactly the opposite message. This date marks the end of the British occupation in 1948, the founding of the modern State of Israel, and the invasion by five Arab armies marking the start of the War of Independence, in which 6,000 Jews – one per cent of the entire pre-state population – were killed.

In other words, it's not the 1967 war and its consequences that are the prime causes of the conflict, but the continued Arab rejection of Israel, after 63 years. Therefore, it would appear that all of the eager peace makers and negotiators that begin (and end) with the scenario of creating a Palestinian state and forcing Israel back to the pre-1967 (actually post-1948) armistice lines are wasting their time.

The word "nakba" is Arabic for catastrophe, and in the Arab/Palestinian narrative, Jewish sovereign equality in the Land of Israel was and remains a disaster. In the nakba fabrication, 4,000 years of Jewish history in this land are erased and replaced with a Europe and western conspiracy to settle Jews in "Arab/Muslim Palestine." The Jews, aided by the West, stole the land and evicted the Arab inhabitants.

The Arab rejection of the UN Partition Plan (the 1947 version of the "two-state solution"), and the wars designed to push the Jews into the sea are also removed from the nakba tale. Instead, the artificial images of hundreds of thousands of innocent refugees being forced to leave their land, and a non-existent "right of return," remain firmly implanted among Arabs, adding fuel to the conflict. (The fact that an approximately equal number of Jews in Arab nations were forced out and absorbed successfully into Israel is also erased in the fictitious history.)

The United Nations Works and Relief Agency (UNRWA), ostensibly designed to help settle the refugees after the 1948 war, perpetuates both their miserable status and the rejectionism that sustains the violence. In addition, a number of European-government funded non-governmental organizations (NGOs), such as Badil, as well as radical church groups, such as Sabeel and Kairos, are among the main promoters of this fictitious history. The goal of these "right of return" organizations, which were also supported for many years by Liberal Canadian governments, is to force Israel to accept millions of people claiming to be descendents of the refugees, thereby replacing the Jewish majority with Arab domination.

The nakba myth provides the foundation for the recent violence that took place across Israel, and in many ways, mimicked the Arab attacks on all fronts

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

63 years ago. In the north, along the Lebanese and Syrian borders, Palestinian sought violent confrontations with Israeli forces. Similarly, along the southern border with Gaza, Hamas members sought to use the cover of "demonstrations" to deploy explosive devices for use against Israeli defence forces. (The Jordanian border remained quiet, demonstrating Amman's understanding that friction with Israel would result in unacceptable instability in Jordan.)

And the recent terror attack in Tel Aviv – using a truck as a weapon – reminded Israelis, and any outsiders capable of overcoming the conventional wisdom, that this incitement results in murderous attacks.

For all of these reasons, it's clear that a realistic peace process must first tackle the nakba mythology, which has been allowed to fester and expand for so long. Instead of continuing to fund the destructive 1948 myths purveyed by UNRWA and Badil, negotiators and diplomats need to channel these resources into constructive education programs for Palestinians, Arabs and Muslims.

In particular, this means teaching of basic facts – that the Jewish people have an undisputed historic connection with this territory – with the right to an independent state – and that the violent Arab rejection of compromise and the two-state solution in 1947/8, as well as the later wars, were responsible for the "suffering of the refugees."

Israelis have shown that when these principles are accepted, they will be ready to make the difficult compromises for a real peace agreement.

St. Louis passenger recalls family's flight

The St. Louis, a black and white ship with eight decks capable of carrying about 400 first-class and 500 tourist-class passengers, normally plied the trans-Atlantic route from Hamburg to New York City. But on May 13, 1939, the St. Louis, with 937 people on board, set sail for Havana.

It was one of the last ships to leave Germany before the flames of World War II engulfed Europe.

Virtually all the passengers were German Jews fleeing persecution in Nazi Germany. They carried valid visas entitling them to land in Cuba. As the St. Louis approached the Caribbean island, the Cuban government informed them they could not debark.

The Hamburg-American Line vessel, flying a red, white and black swastika flag above its mast, steamed into Havana Harbor on May 30. Twenty-nine passengers holding visas for Latin American countries were allowed to get off. The rest were refused entry into Cuba.

The St. Louis made for the port of Miami in Florida, but returned to Europe after the United States and Canada declined to admit the hapless Jewish refugees.

By any measure, the saga of the St. Louis – commemorated by a new memorial in Halifax commissioned by the Canadian Jewish Congress, fictionalized in a novel, Voyage of the Damned, and enshrined in an eponymous Hollywood film starring Faye Dunaway and Oskar Werner – was symptomatic of the times.

Lisa Avedon, a resident of Toronto, was 4-1/2 years old when she boarded the St. Louis more than 70 years ago this month. She was accompanied by her mother, Therese Freund, her grandmother, Ida Laucheimer, and her bother, Phillip.

Now 76, Avedon was seasick during the course of the voyage. "I spent my time in bed," she said. "I don't remember the ocean crossing, but I have a vivid memory of standing on a deck when we docked in Havana."

Avedon and her family were among the last German Jews to leave Germany before it clamped down on Jewish emigration.

On the eve of the voyage, she lived in Munich, the scion of a wealthy family whose greeting card and catalogue company employed 900 workers.

Avedon's relatives began leaving Germany shortly after Adolf Hitler was appointed chancellor in 1933. Her father, Max Joseph, who joined the firm in 1929 after marrying her mother, committed suicide in 1937, not long after the Gestapo threatened to send him to a concentration camp.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

After buying Cuban visas, Avedon and her family travelled by train to Hamburg in northern Germany and stayed in a hotel until the St. Louis embarked.

"I remember the hotel very vividly," said Avedon. "The interior of the elevator had a gold finish. Only a four-year-old could appreciate that."

Having been so young when she boarded the St. Louis, she could hardly know that its captain, Gustav Schroeder, was an anti-Nazi who had instructed the crew to treat passengers civilly.

Nor did the passengers realize that the Cuban government, headed by President Fredrico Laredo Bru, had revised its visa policy after the St. Louis set out from Hamburg.

Under the new regulations, the passengers could gain admittance neither as tourists nor as political refugees, leaving them in limbo.

"We were supposed to get off in Havana and travel to the United States," said Avedon, whose uncle, Werner Gould, had expressly flown to Cuba to meet them. A physician, he had settled in New York City after fleeing Germany.

Lisa Avedon

The St. Louis lay anchored in Havana as the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the U.S. government attempted to persuade Cuba to accept the refugees. Cuba held fast. By all accounts, Germany had dispatched agents to Cuba to stir up antisemitism.

For its part, the United States declined to allow the St. Louis to dock in Miami.

The last hope was Canada, but Prime Minister William Lyon Mackenzie King believed that the St. Louis was not "a Canadian problem."

The director of Canada's immigration department, Frederick Charles Blair, was just as unsympathetic. In a reference to Jewish refugees, Blair infamously said, "None is too many."

Knowing that his passengers had no desire whatsoever to return to Germany, Schroeder – whom Yad Vashem posthumously named as a Righteous Among the Nations in 1993 – refused to go back unless they were granted sanctuary elsewhere in Europe. Working to end the crisis, the United States convinced several European nations – Britain, France, Belgium and Netherlands – to take the refugees.

Having docked in Antwerp, Belgium, on June 17, the St. Louis – which was scrapped in 1952 – disgorged its passengers. Avedon and her family were permitted into Britain. "We crossed the English Channel on a little tugboat," she said.

They lived in Britain for six months, first in London and then in Yelverton, a village set amid bucolic fields. They arrived in New York City in December. For about the next two years, they were put up by Avedon's aunt in Hackensack, N.J. Her mother found a job as a seamstress in a textile factory. "She had never touched a sewing machine in her life," said Avedon.

After getting back on her feet, Avedon's mother rented an apartment in Washington Heights, a New York neighbourhood favoured by German Jewish refugees and jocularly known as Frankfurt-on-the-Hudson. "All the yekkes were there, even our old rabbi. My mother could speak German and could go to German chocolate shops and butchers. It was a wonderful place."

In 1951, her mother remarried. Her second husband, Wilhelm Herz, was a German-Jewish refugee who had immigrated to Chile before settling in the United States. Avedon moved into their new home in Milwaukee. Her grandmother remained behind. Avedon's brother, who lives in Milwaukee today, enlisted in the U.S. army and was posted to Germany as an interpreter.

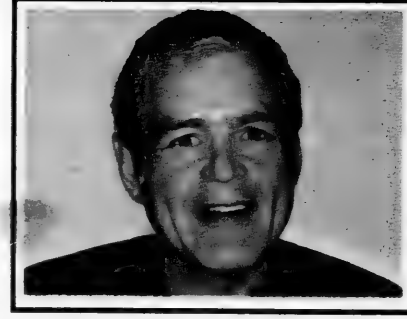
As an undergraduate student, Avedon studied sociology, psychology and adult education. While completing an MA in adult education at Columbia University, she met Elliott Avedon, the man she would marry and with whom she would have two children.

In 1971, he accepted a position as a professor of recreation and physical education at Waterloo University in Kitchener-Waterloo. Later, she was a lecturer at the same university. She ended her academic career at Conestoga College.

She has mixed feelings about Germany. She reviles the nation that persecuted Jews but appreciates the helpful role that German neighbours played in helping her family during the Nazi era.

"I can't say all Germans behaved like Nazis," she said. "Many Germans were against the Nazis."

Romspen is the best financial decision I have ever made.



I am wary of investment tips. Most are a recipe for losing money. But investing with Romspen is absolutely the best investment decision I ever made. In fact, I have reinvested many times over the years.

Don't confuse Romspen with the scammers. Romspen is not too good to be true. It is a fund of first mortgages in Canada that is managed by experienced and fine people. It works because they know what they are doing. Their excellent reputation with both investors and borrowers is well deserved.

Young professionals party for a purpose

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

More than 300 young professionals recently attended the second annual Sinai Soiree, featuring the legendary rock band Chicago.

Hosted by Future Sinai, the soiree, held May 17 at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, was a party within the larger Mount Sinai Hospital Grand Slam Gala. More than $500,000 was raised from the two events, which will go toward the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary's $4.5-million pledge for women's health.

The funding helps ensure that state-of-the art health care is provided to Mount Sinai Hospital's centres of excellence, including the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute and Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health.

The pledge benefits the hospital's major pillars of patient care – research, technology and education – by maintaining funds to help eradicate women's cancers.

This year's gala was the culmination of the Strike Out Cancer Celebrity Tournament, which raised more than $700,000 for Mount Sinai Hospital. The charity baseball games took place May 15 at the Richmond Green Sports Centre, in Richmond Hill, where players teamed up with professional athletes and entertainers including actors Kurt Russell and Dean McDermott and baseball's Vince Coleman.

"This new fundraiser, Strike out Cancer, seemed a perfect opportunity to combine the events and carry over the excitement of a new initiative to an already well-established event in the Toronto Jewish community," said Lauren Winberg, who chaired Sinai Soiree with Alex Enchin.

Sinai Soiree chairs, Lauren Winberg and Alex Enchin

The Strike Out Cancer awards ceremony was held at the gala, as the top teams and fundraisers of the tournament celebrated their achievements.

The gala, which had a host bar, appetizers, dessert tables and a night-capping DJ set, was given a fresh update in terms of style and feel. The traditional seated dinner concept was replaced by lounge areas where guests were served a tapas-style dinner by butlers. The dress code was jeans and jewels.

"The Sinai Soiree is different than any other event in the city," said Winberg. "It provides young professionals the opportunity to attend one of Toronto's most glamorous, high-profile fundraising events, while giving back to a hospital that continuously contributes to our community."

Winberg said having an affiliation with Mount Sinai at a young age "will help solidify it as a cause that is close to our hearts, and will help foster a lifelong philanthropic relationship with it among our generation."

Since many of the Soiree guests were born or treated at Mount Sinai, "the event [gives] the younger generation between the ages of 20 to 30 the opportunity to connect with and give back to the hospital in a fun and engaging atmosphere," she said.

The Sinai Soiree is the first official event hosted by Future Sinai, Winberg said. Launched in February, Future Sinai is a group of young professionals working to advance, promote and fundraise for the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary.

Winberg said Future Sinai hopes to gain more exposure through Sinai Soiree in order to grow the group's membership.

RIM co-founder headlines Weizmann Canada gala

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Curiosity may have killed the cat, but in the realm of science, it's curiosity that underlies all technological breakthroughs, according to Mike Lazaridis, co-founder and chairman of Research in Motion, the company that created the ubiquitous BlackBerry.

"Curiosity, the basic instinct to understand the world around us, has produced health and wealth," said Lazaridis, keynote speaker at a Weizmann Canada gala held May 12 at the Royal Ontario Museum.

Lazaridis is also founder of the Perimeter Institute for Theoretical Physics. He donated $150 million to create the scientific institution, which he described a "kindred spirit" to the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel.

The Weizmann evening, which drew some 400 people and raised more than $3 million, included a ceremonial dedication honouring individuals for whom state-of-the-art laboratories will be named.

The evening was an opportunity for Prof. Daniel Zajfman, president of the Weizmann Institute, to pay tribute to the honorees and Lazaridis.

Zajfman also announced that the largest Canadian donation to Weizmann had just been made by the Azrieli Foundation. The foundation will be supporting a new institute in systems biology, called the Azrieli Institute of Systems Biology, a multidisciplinary approach to biology that combines physics, chemistry and math.

Zajfman also noted that the encryption software used by BlackBerry was developed by the Weizmann institute. And he stressed that Lazaridis' views on science mirror his own views on curiosity and basic research.

Lazaridis' speech, which outlined the implications of the key scientific breakthroughs throughout the ages, fit with the evening's theme of Back to Basics, Forward to the Future. As he put it: "Curiosity-driven research is important to our future, our past and our current way of life."

He made the case for supporting pure scientific research by giving a brief history of scientific discovery and its impact on society. "There is limitless value to research and making theoretical discoveries. Discoveries in theoretical physics today lead to the technologies of tomorrow."

For instance, when scientists observed that magnetic fields could induce electric currents in the mid-19th century, Lazaridis pointed out that there was no immediate practical application, but it eventually led to the discovery of electricity. "That discovery transformed the industrial age."

Similarly, he noted that no one ever thought that Einstein's theory of relativity would lead to the creation of GPS (global positioning systems) technology.

Other speakers that evening included Miles Nadal, as well as gala chair, radio personality and former provincial Conservative leader John Tory, the evening's MC. Also in attendance were Jonathan Levy, Israeli consul for economic affairs and trade commissioner to Canada, city councillor James Pasternak, and Liberal MP Bob Rae.

Rae told The CJN that he's been a longtime supporter of the Weizmann Institute and a close friend of H. Thomas Beck, chairman emeritus of Weizmann Canada. Beck's daughter, Catherine, is now the president, and Jay Smith is the current chair of Weizmann Canada.

The following laboratories were established for the Canadian honorees: Marianne Manoville Beck Laboratory for Research in Neurobiology in honour of Marianne Manoville's parents, Elisabeth and Miksa Manoville; the Dr. Sydney Brenner Laboratory for Research in Molecular Biology; the Miles and Kelly Nadal and Family Laboratory for Research in Molecular Genetics; the Dr. Lou Siminovitch Laboratory for Research in Neurobiology; the Jay Smith and Laura Rapp Laboratory for Research in the Physics of Complex Systems; the Marvin Tanner Laboratory for Cancer Research; the Sharon Zuckerman Laboratory for Research Systems Biology, and the Laboratory for Research in Plant Sciences, funded by an anonymous donor.

Yeshiva celebrates its 10th anniversary

Many of the grads have gone on to a mixture of Jewish and secular careers

Laura Fixman
Intern

Toronto's Yeshiva Darchei Torah has come a long way since it opened 10 years ago, but the school's core philosophy has remained the same, rosh yeshiva Rabbi Eliezer Breitowitz says.

The school was started by a group of parents who wanted an equal balance between religious and secular instruction and felt that some of the other schools in the community had become too polarized, Rabbi Breitowitz said in an interview. They recognized that many of their children would enter secular professions.

"The middle of the road isn't always the most popular place," Rabbi Breitowitz said, but the school eventually gained the community's support and grew accordingly.

Darchei Torah started with two grades and about 30 boys. Today, it has grades 9 to 12 and more than twice as many students. In addition, it opened in a rented facility but was eventually able to buy its own campus.

Now, Rabbi Breitowitz said, "when the vast majority of students here enter Grade 9, this is their first choice. Oftentimes it's their only choice."

The milestone anniversary was celebrated with a dinner at Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto on May 15, where they honoured people who were instrumental in creating and building the school.

Honorees included Rabbi Breitowitz, who has been the head of the school from the beginning, and two founders of the yeshiva, Sheldon Salcman and Israel Weinstock, who were instrumental in getting the first teachers and the first location.

Rosh yeshiva Rabbi Eliezer Breitowitz was among those honoured at Yeshiva Darchei Torah's recent 10th anniversary gala. Seen at the event are, from left, Moishe Posner, Michael Harris and Rabbi Breitowitz.

Rabbi Breitowitz said the 10th anniversary dinner was a success in more ways than just as a fundraiser.

"It was an opportunity for people who have no direct connection to the school to learn about it."

A guest speaker at the event was Darchei Torah graduate Yehuda Azoulay, who has written about Sephardi history in community magazines and in his book called A Legacy of Leaders.

Rabbi Breitowitz said many of the graduates have gone on to a mixture of Jewish and secular careers. After 10 years, parents are seeing that the students are prepared for that balance, which has been the focus from the beginning.

"Parents are hesitant to entrust their children to a school they don't know will last," he said.

Others honoured at the celebration included parents and grandparents of students, who have helped make the school a success, Rabbi Breitowitz said. This kind of family support will help the students remain connected to the school and fuel its growth in the future, he added.

"It might be somewhere they consider sending their children someday."

Darchei Torah offers a well-rounded education that the rabbi feels is necessary.

"We offer both an authentic yeshiva experience and an authentic high school experience," he said.

As a result, most graduates spend some time studying in Israel, and then go on to university in Canada.

Rabbi Breitowitz also looks forward to seeing where their graduates end up in years to come.

In the next 10 years, Rabbi Breitowitz hopes to see the school continue to have the balance it has now.

"What we say now, we would have said 10 years ago," Rabbi Breitowitz said. "We hope to be saying the same thing in the next 10 years."

Educator thinks of herself, students as 'resilient'

Earlier this month, Judit Kenyeres received an award as "Teacher of the Year" from the Council for Exceptional Children's Toronto Chapter 56, recognizing her years of service to special needs students.

As the head of the Learning Centre (special education and remediation department) at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Wallenberg campus on Wilmington Avenue, Kenyeres doesn't work in a formal setting and isn't currently teaching a course.

By Frances Kraft

But the 63-year-old educator, who is also an educational psychologist, often works one-on-one with students, teaching them learning strategies, organizational methods and writing skills. "Many students are articulate, and strong orally, but cannot translate that to paper," she said.

As well, she advocates on behalf of students who have had difficulties in the classroom.

A child of Holocaust survivors who immigrated with her brother and widowed mother from Hungary to Montreal at age nine, Kenyeres recalls that she also had special needs, but hers were related in large part to being a child refugee who didn't speak English.

As a result, she thinks of herself as "resilient," and believes that her students have the capacity to be resilient, too.

A lesson from the teacher: "Different doesn't mean 'less than.'"

Kenyeres, who likes to wear what she calls "a lot of jingle-jangle" in the form of silver bracelets and other jewelry, also has a strong creative bent. A published poet and photographer whose exhibitions date back to the early 1980s, she recently took up filmmaking following the death of her husband 1-1/2 years ago.

It was as an undergraduate student at McGill University in the late 1960s that Kenyeres developed an interest in special education. Working with autistic children on locked wards of an institution, she found she had an affinity for the youngsters.

Her teaching career began at a school for exceptional children in London, England, where she earned her post-graduate certificate in education from the University of London.

At the time, she said, "the whole notion of special education was new... It was so experimental, but very gratifying."

Kenyeres spent most of her career in Montreal, however, before moving to Toronto 13 years ago to take the position at TanenbaumCHAT. At the time, she was working as a psychologist and teaching in Concordia University's education department.

In 1978, she received a master's of education from what is now the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, and nine years later, she earned an MA in educational psychology from McGill University.

Her work at TanenbaumCHAT, where she oversees a department that serves 187 students, is "a great contrast" to the early years of her career, both because of the time that has passed and the capability of her current students, many of whom go on to university and college.

Thirteen years later, she still finds it rewarding to see her students thrive and "feel good about who they are."

Her work energizes her, she said. "It's important work... We can't give up. We can learn and change, and have an impact on our abilities throughout the years, not just in the early years. That's very encouraging."

For widows, widowers, 18 years is W.O.W.

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

The WOW (Widows or Widowers) group is celebrating its 18th anniversary this year.

The brainchild of Beverley Bobkin-English and her two widowed friends, WOW started on a snowy day in 1993. Eleven strangers gathered for brunch at the Chimo Hotel (now the Holiday Inn) in Markham, Ont., after seeing a newspaper ad for the group.

After the loss of her husband of 27 years, Bobkin-English had immersed herself in reading and searching for consolation in grieving books. "In one of them, it mentioned a group formed specifically for widows and widowers for support and friendship," she said. "This idea remained with me for nine years, but I did not proceed with it."

Bobkin-English returned to teaching and eventually acted on her thoughts. "I phoned the Toronto Star and placed an ad in the personals announcing that a group for Jewish widows and widowers was being formed."

WOW was never meant to be a grieving group, she said. "It's a group for moving on. We are joined together by a common bond."

Today, 70-plus members continue to meet regularly to enjoy a wide range of planned events. "Hundreds of widows and widowers have passed through our doors. Some have stayed a short time, while others have remained for many years, building relationships, taking on major chairmanships and committing themselves to the success of WOW."

Bobkin-English said a sense of unity has developed through shared interests in music, art, theatre and travel. "Notable speakers, museum outings, cruising, Chanukah parties, anniversary celebrations, bowling, picnics, potlucks and gallery visits are just a few of the events planned for a Saturday or Sunday, when it could possibly be a quiet or lonely time."

WOW gives members the opportunity to enjoy fun activities with others who have experienced a similar loss, she said. "Lifelong friendships have developed in WOW, among those who in most situations did not know one another prior to meeting at a WOW function. Marriages have taken place and long-term relationships have evolved."

Bobkin-English said the satisfaction of seeing her "'child' mature, reach out and grow to be productive in the Jewish community" is one of her most cherished accomplishments.

"I am ecstatic and so very proud! The small seed planted 18 years ago has blossomed to become a beautiful flower, giving joy and comfort to all who have been part of WOW. My heart is filled with pride. May we continue our network of friendship and congratulate WOW for its enthusiasm, support and commitment."

With a focus to serve the community, Bobkin-English said the group always welcomes new members ages 60-plus. "We would especially like to increase the number of widowers in our group for a more varied membership. This is not a singles group, so attending an event is pressure free."

For information about WOW, call Anne Bradley at 416-226-0530 or Phyllis Fraser at 905-771-8435.

Secular Jewish congress to hold conference

Laura Fixman
Intern

The Congress of Secular Jewish Organizations (CSJO) is presenting a weekend of workshops, guest speakers and social-action events at Humber College from May 27 to 30.

The conference will begin with an Oneg Shabbat, presented by youth from the Peretz Centre for Secular Jewish Culture and Education. Friday will also feature a dramatic presentation by the Winchevsky Wits of the Winchevsky Centre in Toronto.

On Saturday, there will be two keynote speakers. The first is Ester Reiter, a professor of women's studies at York University. She is currently working on a book about the Jews in Canada in the 1920s and 1930s.

The second speaker is Kerry Dyson, a third-generation member of the Peretz Centre in Vancouver. He is helping to organize J-West, a West Coast regional conference that brings together Jews from the United States and Canada.

Conference workshops include "Jewish Genealogy," presented by Gord Meslin of the Genealogical Society of Canada. University of Toronto anthropology professor Richard Lee lectures on "Jewish Pirates of the Caribbean" and David Abramowitz offers "Why Cultural Standards Change."

The CSJO is partnering with Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, for a social action event on Saturday evening. Attendees will stuff 500 Kinder Kits containing school supplies for Canadian children in need. Ve'ahavta's Kinder Kit Project has provided children in 10 countries with school supplies. The event is sponsored by Ed's Real Scoop ice cream.

Before the Kinder Kit event, conference participants will ask friends and family to make pledges toward this cause on an online challenge page. Funds raised will be split between CSJO and the Kinder Kit Project.

Saturday night will include a performance by the Naivelt Singers, celebrating the 85th anniversary of Camp Naivelt, a secular Jewish summer community in Brampton, Ont. They will sing songs about political activism and the struggle for peace, workers rights and social justice.

Two- or three-bedroom suites at Humber College are offered as accommodation for conference participants. For more information, go to www.csjo.org.

ועל כן אני קורא לכולכם להחרים את הפסטיבל, ולהפיץ את הנתון המשפיל הזה בין כל חבריכם. אני מבטיח להזכיר לכם את זה לפני הפסטיבל הבא. ועכשיו גם באנגלית, כדי שגם יהדים ציוניים ידעו:

It has been several years now that the Jewish Film Festival takes place during the Israeli Memorial Day for Israeli soldiers. All attempts by the Israeli Consulate and other leaders to convince Helen Zukerman and her board that they insult 50,000 Israelis in Toronto, for whom this is the most meaningful day in the calendar, have failed. Therefore I call upon all Toronto Israelis, as well as all jews who care about Israel- to boycott the festival starting next year .

After a fight with his family last year, Ruben Delgado left home and lived on Toronto's streets, selling drugs to get by.

"Me and my family weren't too happy with each other," said the 18-year-old.

To cope with his situation, Delgado started writing about how he felt lost and confused. One day, he came across a notice for submissions for a creative writing contest for homeless and marginalized people, posted by Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee

Theresa Schrader

"About a week later I saw it again, and I said to myself, 'maybe I should do this,' so I decided to submit one of my pieces," he said.

His submission ended up winning first prize. "I was surprised that I won. It gave me a lot of confidence, a lot of hope," Delgado said.

The winners of this year's Ve'ahavta Creative Writing Contest, which is celebrating its 10th anniversary, will receive their prizes at an awards presentation on June 12.

First prize is $2,000, second prize is a technology bundle, including a laptop, digital camera and a year's Internet service, and third prize is $1,000.

Since winning the contest last summer, Delgado has been working to get his life on track. He began his first job, coaching children's basketball, and passed all of his classes for the first time.

"I went back to my family and we spoke, and we realized that both of us did things wrong, but we can still work things out," he said.

Theresa Schrader, who organized this year's competition, said that writing can be an important tool for self-expression, especially for those experiencing hardship.

"A lot of people are silenced and a lot of people are forced into the margins of society, and they lose their voice," she said.

Like Delgado, Schrader has worked her way out of extreme circumstances through writing. Before winning the 2005 creative writing contest, Schrader was living on the streets, working as a prostitute to support a crack addiction.

"I wrote about a sexual assault that happened to me... I guess writing it out was the first part of that therapeutic journey of getting through the trauma," she said. "After winning the contest I saw that there was some inherent value inside myself, and I started working on getting clean."

Since winning the competition, Schrader has completed the social service worker program at George Brown College, and spends much of her time volunteering for Ve'ahavta. She was recently named its community poverty relief associate.

After being exclusive to Toronto, the contest was opened to submissions from Vancouver last year, and it has expanded once again, to include entries from Halifax, near Schrader's hometown.

When Schrader made the suggestion, Ve'ahavta's president Avrum Rosensweig agreed to it as he liked the idea of reaching out to the homeless communities on each coast.

"I wanted to go into Vancouver last year because I know of the homeless situation there, and it's pretty abysmal," he said. "Halifax being at the other end of the country, there's some poetry to that. Almost like bookends."

Rosensweig, who writes a column for The CJN, said he's "always believed that one of the ways of strengthening our world, making our planet better for the people who live in it, is by tapping into their creativity. I've always thought that in itself is a solution to homelessness."

Last summer, Rosensweig and Schrader founded the Ve'ahavta Street Academy, which aimed to teach 10 homeless people, including Delgado, the skills they needed to get off the streets. Among the academy's guest lecturers was CBC sportscaster Ron MacLean, who is one of the judges of this year's writing contest.

"Ron came in and spoke to the class, and he was just so inspiring," said Rosensweig. "He was talking about how it was important to have mentors and support, and while he was talking about that, he wrote his phone number down on the blackboard."

MacLean said he got the idea of giving out his phone number from the book When All You Have Is Hope, by Frank O'Dea.

"Frank's the co-founder of Second Cup," said MacLean. "In 1971, Frank was on the street and a social worker gave him his phone number and a handful of dimes." The social worker told Frank to call the number anytime he needed support, added MacLean.

"In my case, no one has called, but I think they felt a similar benefit without having to dial."

Delgado agrees. "At first I didn't know who he was, but when he started speaking I really liked the way he made his words sound poetic," he said. "Him being there was a big thing for me."

Abbas inverts the truth in the N.Y. Times

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

While historical events are always open to reinterpretation upon the discovery of new evidence, some events are so well corroborated as established fact that efforts to re-write them for a political gain are nothing short of contemptible. Could anyone seriously maintain, for instance, that World War II began when Poland attacked Germany in September 1939? Of course not.

But something on that scale – the acceptance of the inversion of truth – is being asked of the reader of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' opinion article "The Long Overdue Palestinian State", published May 17 in the New York Times.

This piece is such a breathtaking pastiche of distortion and omission of basic facts that it's hard to know where to begin.

What is clear is that Abbas reiterates a prevalent narrative very effectively to a naive western audience. In this account, the helpless Palestinians, who always sought peace, were victimized by aggressive, rejectionist Zionists bent on conquering and dispossessing the Palestinians.

According to Abbas, as the Palestinians "commemorate another year of our expulsion" since Israel's establishment in 1948, they now have hope that the UN General Assembly will recognize a Palestinian state this coming September. Their perennial tragedy will thus finally become triumph. Who couldn't sympathize with such a positive development?

After all, Abbas argues, the Palestinians have no recourse but to turn once again to the United Nations. Why once again? Here's Abbas' explanation: "It is important to note that the last time the question of Palestinian statehood took centre stage at the General Assembly, the question posed to the international community was whether our homeland should be partitioned into two states. In November 1947, the General Assembly made its recommendation and answered in the affirmative. Shortly thereafter, Zionist forces expelled Palestinian Arabs to ensure a decisive Jewish majority in the future State of Israel, and Arab armies intervened."

What Abbas does not admit are the following indisputable (but, for him, inconvenient) facts. In 1947, Palestinian and Arab leaders vehemently rejected the Partition Resolution that sought the creation of both an "Arab" state and a "Jewish" state. Only the Jewish leadership accepted the plan. Ironically, while Abbas refers to the creation of "two states", he cannot bring himself to utter the term "Jewish state" – a concept he refuses to accept.

By writing that the UN "answered in the affirmative," Abbas leaves the distinct impression that the two-state proposal was supported by the Palestinians (just as Abbas is hoping the UN will, once more, recognize a Palestinian state this year). Again, this is utterly false. Immediately following the 1947 vote in favour of partition, the Palestinians attacked Jews throughout the land. Jews fought back in self-defence.

Mahmoud Abbas

In Abbas' account, when the State of Israel was declared in May, 1948, Arab armies "intervened" to protect Palestinians who were being "expelled" by Zionists. In fact, the Arab armies invaded to destroy the nascent Jewish state (as explained in historian Benny Morris's scrupulously fair book, 1948). Going almost week by week from November 1947, Morris described how thousands of Palestinians, starting with the elites, fled the conflict they had initiated. Following the Arab invasion, when fighting intensified, Jewish forces did expel Palestinians in some cases (Ramle, Lod), but urged them to stay in others (such as Haifa). Overwhelmingly, the Palestinians were victims of the rejectionist decisions of their leadership and of the Arab invasion of Israel.

Ignoring efforts by previous Israeli governments to negotiate the creation of a Palestinian state (offers rejected by former PA president Yasser Arafat and Abbas himself), Abbas pretends that the only recourse the Palestinians have is to appeal to the UN. He also maintains that once statehood is declared, he'll be willing to "negotiate" as long as Israel, in effect, accepts the "right of return" of Palestinian refugees to Israel. This is a prescription for the end of Israel as a Jewish homeland, showing (yet again) that Abbas is determined to extend the conflict, not resolve it.

Sadly, Abbas' piece reminds us that, for the Palestinians, the war of 1948 never really ended.

Renanim School benefits from gift made in name of A & A Records founders

By Daniel Horowitz

We've all heard the incredible stories of those who, when faced with adversity, somehow find the strength and will to not only survive, but to thrive. Alice and Mac Kenner were such people.

The youngest of seven children, Alice never knew her father who had immigrated to Toronto shortly after her birth and died of influenza. In 1922, Alice, her mother and her sister Rose, joined her siblings, Julius, Nathan, Aaron and Freda in Toronto. Her eldest sister, Chia, stayed behind and died in the Holocaust.

Brothers Julius and Nathan had opened a couple of variety stores, one on Bloor Street, and one on Yonge Street, called Rain Brothers. Alice worked in Julius' store at 353 Yonge Street. When Julius succumbed to a heart attack in 1944, Alice found herself unemployed for the first time in her life, and with few options.

Fortunately, as often happens in these stories, fate soon intervened, and Alice discovered that a man was selling his bookstore, next door to Rain Brothers, at 355 ½ Yonge Street.

Using her sharp business acumen, Alice rented the store for $60.00 a month, and, for $400.00, she purchased the assets and content.

Within a year, a neighbouring shop at 351 Yonge Street was up for sale and, with brother Aaron's help, Alice opened A&A Book Store. While her husband Mac, a telegrapher by trade, and a talented musician and raconteur, wanted to also sell records, most companies refused to supply him, so he bought $100 worth on his own and sold-out in the first week. And with that, an iconic Toronto – and Canadian – business was born. A&A Records.

(inset) 351 Yonge Street was home to the A & A Book Store

"My parents, Alice and Mac Kenner were voracious readers," says daughter, June. "Through A & A, they started out selling text books for what is today, Ryerson University, as well as dental and medical texts for the University of Toronto. Growing up, books were always front and centre in our home, and they always played an important role in our lives. My father was the front man, my mother, the backbone. They complemented each other in work and in life; they were a great pair. Even after they retired, their lives went full circle back to selling books at antique markets and craft shows."

When it came to honouring the memory of her bibliophile parents, the choice was clear, and, again, books would play a prominent role in her decision, as would Israel, a favourite travel destination of Mac and Alice. In fact, in 1981, June's 71-year-old father, and middle child, Daniel, shared a bar mitzvah at the Kotel in Jerusalem, while Daniel's siblings, Mark and Sara, looked on proudly. Alice had also became involved with ORT (Organization for Rehabilitation and Training) as a fundraiser, and together, she and Mac became donors to an ORT school in Israel.

Through United Jewish Appeal's recently concluded Campaign 2011, June made a generous donation to Kiryat Shmona's Renanim School for Disabled Children, creating the Alice and Mac Kenner Library.

Founded 45 years ago, Renanim serves 120 children aged 6 to 21 with physical and/or mental disabilities. Due to extensive rocket damage during the second Lebanon War in 2006, the school was closed down and moved to another location. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, along with the Rashi Foundation, created this new, exceptional campus, an innovative model for special education suited to the unique needs of its students.

"My mom lived the immigrants' dream," says June, leafing through old black and white photographs of her parents. "She exceeded even her own expectations because she was brilliant and driven. She didn't believe in looking back, only forward. Even when the subway came to Toronto, Alice was convinced that people would no longer have to come up to street level, making business even tougher."

But, true to form, and with Mac's ever present encouragement, the couple kept their noses to the proverbial grindstone, ultimately making A&A Records a name synonymous with Canadian music.

And, it's June's hope that, along with honouring her beloved parents' memory, she'll be giving the children at Renanim School the opportunity to exceed their, and their families' expectations.

"These children have undoubtedly lived difficult lives, as have their families," says June. "I hope that this gift will provide them with the opportunity to reach, and even go beyond their expectations. My parents absolutely loved children, and I'm so thrilled that my mother was able to meet my son-in-law Kevin, and fall madly in love with her precious lone great-grandchild, Mackenzie, named after my father, in 2004. I know they would be so proud to have their names on this important school. My parents both exemplified the Canadian dream, and, together they cut a large swath in Toronto and in Canada, and, hopefully, through this gift, they will be doing the same in Israel."

Help Jewish Toronto plan for the future by completing the census

In the last month, you should have received a Census Canada package asking you to complete a short census form online. One in every 3 households will also be asked to fill out a longer voluntary questionnaire, called the National Household Survey (NHS).

If you are selected to complete the NHS, UJA Federation is asking you to do so in order to help Toronto's Jewish community plan for the future and continue to thrive.

Jewish community members who fill in the NHS, and identify themselves as Jewish (question 22), will help, according to UJA Federation, ensure a robust, Jewish population presence in Canada, a strong community voice and the provision of future needs.

"The information that we provide by completing the National Household Survey will help to accurately reflect Jewish population growth, strengthen our voice with all levels of government, allow UJA and other agencies to meet community needs, and offer the necessary data for governments to make funding decisions," explains Sheldon Goodman, Co-chair, UJA Federation Committee on Public Affairs.

Statistics Canada has repeatedly said that it will not release Census data unless it is deemed reliable, and the next census isn't for another ten years. In order to uncover vital, useful data such as Jewish populations by neighbourhood, StatsCan needs approximately 16,000 Jewish community members in the GTA to complete the NHS. Simply put, the higher the response rate, the more accurate the data.

UJA Federation is asking those selected to complete the National Household Survey

"JIAS Toronto has relied heavily on the census data and especially on the census analysis series done by Montreal demographer Charles Shahar (and UJA Federation) in 2005 in all its planning processes," said Janis Roth, Executive Director, JIAS Toronto. "The census data provided the evidence and the Shahar series provided the critical analysis necessary to draw the right conclusions to inform programs and develop relevant services for Jewish immigrants arriving to the GTA. We learned about migration patterns, income levels and employment needs, language and the rapid growth of York Region amongst other factors."

"Representing a social service agency charged with responding to complex patterns of need and to addressing the effects of poverty in our community, I am very concerned that the omission of crucial data regarding employment, income, education and home ownership will significantly interfere with our ability to allocate resources and make funding decisions with confidence," said Richard Cummings, Executive Director, Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS). "Good policy, best practices and effective intervention rely on these data."

Shimon Fogel, the new CEO of CIJA – or Newco, as the restructured Jewish community advocacy apparatus is being temporarily called – said he was "confident" that Farber's move into politics would continue to contribute to the "welfare of our community" and that Jewish Ontarians would "continue to benefit from his knowledge, expertise and commitment to amcha (the Jewish people)."

Fogel also said he would welcome Farber back to Newco if he wanted to return to Jewish communal work.

"If Bernie's political aspirations do not work, there is absolutely an honoured place for him within the organization," he said.

Fogel added: "However, CJC – like the other agencies [currently operating under CIJA, which include the Canada-Israel Committee, University Outreach Committee and the Quebec-Israel Committee] – will no longer exist as an independent entity. So his role will be defined within the context of the new advocacy agency."

Shimon Fogel

The anticipated roll-out of the new national advocacy structure is now scheduled for some time in June, Fogel said.

Asked to reflect on his time in Congress, Farber said he wanted to thank its "incredible and wonderful" staff, and he fondly recalled his time at the organization.

He said he was "immensely proud" of what Congress had accomplished under his watch.

"We have worked especially effectively with interlocutors outside of our community. That's been the real strength of Congress. For example, when the United Church of Canada was poised to vote on a boycott, divestment and sanctions resolution last year in B.C., CJC went there to work the room and turned that around. That, to me, is a huge part of our legacy."

Ironically, he said, his first job with Congress in 1984 was as an advocate at Queen's Park trying to secure government funding for Jewish day schools, a subject that will likely be a lightning rod for debate within the Jewish community regarding his candidacy.

That's because he'll be running for a party that has refused to fund Jewish day schools. Premier Dalton McGuinty has said continually that public funding for faith-based schools is not in the cards.

As Congress CEO, Farber has been outspoken on this file over the years, arguing that the issue is one of fairness and citing the fact the province funds Catholic schools to the exclusion of those of other faiths.

Farber said he's reconciled this paradox by realizing that "knocking on the door" from the outside is not a strategy that has worked. But if he wins a seat in the legislature, whether as part of the ruling party or in opposition, he believes he'll be in a better position to work on the issue from the political side.

"While the premier and I may disagree on this subject, I'll have the opportunity to speak inside the tent and try to effect change. My values... and position on funding [for Jewish day schools] have not changed," he said.

Farber said his whole professional life has centred on two issues: human rights and social justice. This is mainly due to the inspiration and influence of his Holocaust survivor father – his family hails from Bocki, Poland – who taught him to always fight for these values.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, whom Farber calls his "rav" – Rabbi Bulka married Farber and his wife and is chair of Congress' religious and interreligious affairs committee – has watched and mentored the soon-to-be former Congress CEO from his days as a student activist in Ottawa.

Peter Shurman

The rabbi said that while he avoids publicly endorsing political candidates, he wanted to thank Farber for his work at Congress. He also joked that the term "activist" didn't do justice to Farber's time at Carleton University.

"He was a hyper-activist," Rabbi Bulka quipped. "As CEO of Congress, Bernie had a fire in his belly and did not shrink from issues or compromise his principles."

Rabbi Bulka cited Farber's "intense love" for the Jewish community as the driving force that served him well at Congress. "His father was a survivor... He understands what the community has been through."

Farber said he knows some of his staff and people in the community are frightened of the changes that are about to occur at Congress, but he said he preferred to look at the glass as "half full."

"Change can be good, and it can be renewing and energizing. We have to stay positive in our hearts that there will be room [in Newco] for those who have been dedicated to Congress."

Esther approaches King Achashverosh in Laya Crust's megillah

Toronto soferet writes a modern megillah

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

An observant Toronto artist and soferet (scribe) is restoring images of women while adding contemporary meanings to a classic biblical text with her illuminated Megillat Esther.

Commissioned by Rabbi Shalom Schachter and his wife, Marcia Gilbert, Laya Crust's ornate, often whimsical full-colour megillah is on display at St. Michael's College's Kelly Library until June 18.

Beyond the megillah's brilliant illuminations, Crust – an experienced calligrapher – "spent one to 1-1/2 years practising sofrut," perfecting the techniques before putting quill to parchment.

Traditionally prohibited from writing Torahs, mezuzot and tfillin, women may write megillot and ketubot. Crust, a member of the Mizrachi Bayit congregation, spent one month on the text, using an extremely difficult page layout in which 11 of 16 columns begin with the word hamelech.

For the illuminations, Crust drew on her experience working with clients. "I try to use imagery that brings my client into the piece," says Crust.

Gilbert agrees. "Laya really gets to know you as a person…it was exciting to see some of the personal stuff."

Rabbi Schacter and his brother Joseph used to dress up as scheming guards Bigtan and Teresh, so Crust painted them into the megillah, with a tiny pair of glasses for Joseph. Gilbert and Schacter appear, as do their children. Crust is there, too, as a scribe, writing letters to send throughout Achashverosh's kingdom.

The personal touches add to the sumptuous Persian-inspired illustrations. "I love the foliage lines. It's opulent and wonderful – I didn't want to stop," says Crust.

Characters wear authentic 16th-century Persian dress, with a tallit for Mordechai. In one scene, he wears the rainbow tallit created by Rabbi Schachter's father, Rabbi Zalman Schachter-Shalomi, founder of the Jewish Renewal movement. Crust also painted Gilbert's mother, Esther, who was buried on Purim a decade ago.

To bring the characters to life, Crust asked herself, "What were they thinking, feeling?" One scene shows a sleepless Achashverosh in bed, leaning peevishly on his pillow, bags under his eyes, worry lines across his brow, pyjamas endearingly dotted with tiny moons and stars, while Haman lurks outside the door.

Crust, an award-winning artist who has also worked in clay, fabric and glass, has created more than 500 ketubot, many of which are available as prints on her website (www.layacrust.com). As a religious soferet, she said that she's proud to "join a line of history of sofrim going back thousands of years."

For Crust, the message of the Book of Esther is to stand up against hatred. The page on which the 10 sons of Haman are listed depicts 10 figures who represent antisemitism and evil throughout history – from Pharaoh to Queen Isabella to Hitler.

Standing up includes gender rights, and Crust included women in almost every scene. In one, Vashti turns her back on male courtiers. The hem of her dress shows a neat row of tiny "female" symbols, a Renaissance astrological reference to the planet Venus.

After leaving St. Michael's College on June 18, the megillah will likely be shown in other museums, and then it will return home to be stitched together and put away to be read and enjoyed next Purim.

For more information about the exhibit, contact Marcia Gilbert at 416-636-0500 or Leslie Belzak of St. Michael's College at 416-926-7286.

Reena in the News

Reena

This month marks the 10th anniversary of the opening of Reena's first home dedicated specifically to the needs and comfort of young men with autism. The Martin and Heather Goose Home for young men with autism and complex needs was opened in 2001 when the Goose family made a generous donation for the home to the Reena Foundation. Since then, the partnership between individuals, families, government and Reena has been strengthened by the dedication of staff, families and donors who want to create the best of care for all people with disabilities.

Lee's Story

In 1994, Lee's family began the long roller coaster ride to find the appropriate services for him, a teenager with autism and complex needs.

Lee is a handsome, verbal, and affectionate youth. However all of this is overshadowed by the severity and length of his aggressions. After a very traumatic experience in the psychiatric ward of a local hospital and temporary placement at a children's facility, Lee went to live in a residence which was supposed to have the appropriate services but did not really meet his needs. He remained there for five years. His parents drove the 100 mile round trip to bring him home on weekends, determined that he would always be part of their circle of family and friends.

Providentially Lee's older sister, a nursing student, had a practicum at the Battle Centre and was able to introduce her family to Reena. After a ten minute interview, her mother decided that this was the organization that could help them in their search for a home for Lee. She and her husband joined a Reena parent group, and with support from Reena staff, were on their way to creating the type of facility they believed that their son and others deserved. The first step was to develop a Life Plan for Lee. This took one and a half years. It took a further three years to secure funding from the Ministry of Community and Social Services.

Then it was time to search for the best programming and housing for their son. Lee's mother continues, "It was essential to have qualified and well-trained staff that could monitor and administer medication while meeting the ever-changing challenges of his behaviour. We desperately wanted him in a safe and caring community where he would be valued and supported and where our family could take an active role." After looking at many service providers and considering their son's needs, they decided that Reena was the right place for him.

In his mother's words, "We selected Reena and we have never for one moment regretted our decision. The front line staff that work with Lee are amazing! They are always looking for creative ways to engage him in activities."

Counting more than time

Rabbi Zushe Silberstein

Rabbinic Reflections

On Passover, God took the Jews out of Egypt, but He didn't take Egypt out of the Jews. He liberated our people from slavery, but didn't change their slave mentality. That task, the refinement of their individual nature and the cultivation of their spiritual personalities, He left to the people themselves.

This pattern is not merely a story of the past. Every year on Passover, God takes us out of Egypt, giving us the opportunity to experience spiritual liberation. But after Passover, He asks us to internalize that experience and make our spiritual heights part of our own personal framework. And He entrusts the responsibility for this endeavour to us.

We can't expect spiritual growth and heightened consciousness to happen by itself or to be granted to us from above on a consistent basis. Instead, Judaism has always put the emphasis on personal initiative. We ourselves can change ourselves. This endeavour is a lifelong task for each of us, 365 days a year. Nevertheless, every year, a period of time is set aside when these efforts become the focus of our attention.

This reflects the spiritual significance of sfirat haOmer, counting the Omer, the period of 49 days between the holidays of Passover and Shavuot. The people of Israel departed Egypt on the 15th of Nisan (the first day of Passover). Forty-nine days later, on the sixth of Sivan, celebrated ever since as the festival of Shavuot, they assembled at the foot of Mount Sinai and received the Torah from God.

According to Kabbalah, Jewish mystical tradition, we have seven fundamental emotional qualities. These qualities interrelate, combining with each other to form the full range of human feeling. Seven multiplied by seven equals 49, the number of days mentioned above. This is not coincidental, for the cultivation of our spiritual personalities during these 49 days involves the refinement of our emotions, eliminating their coarseness and directing them to godliness.

The Hebrew word sfirah means "counting." But it also means "shining." During these 49 days, we should endeavour to make our personalities shine.

Each year, we retrace this inner journey with our counting of the Omer. Beginning on the second night of Passover, we count the days and weeks: "Today is one day to the Omer"; "Today is two days to the Omer"; "Today is seven days, which are one week to the Omer"; and so on, until "Today is 49 days, which are seven weeks to the Omer." Shavuot, the Festival of Weeks, is the product of this count, driven by the miracles and revelations of the Exodus, but achieved by a methodical, 49-step process of self-refinement within the human soul.

As we work to upgrade our emotional potential, we prepare ourselves to relive the experience of the giving of the Torah on the holiday of Shavuot.

By taking the Egyptian slave mentality out of us through a focus on climbing the 49 steps to personal perfection, we will all merit the revelation of godliness on this earth, the time of Mashiach when "the universe will be filled with the knowledge of God as the ocean is filled with water."

What about immortality?

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

Does Judaism accept the concept of life after death? I find that even knowledgeable and observant Jews aren't sure.

About 2,000 years ago, there was a sharp difference of opinion. The Sadducees argued they couldn't find this teaching in the Torah. As strict interpreters of scripture, they opposed the idea. But the Pharisees – sages of the Talmud who interpreted the Torah in a more liberal and open manner – maintained there were enough hints and references to life after death in the Torah to justify this belief. And so it's endured in Jewish tradition, and all branches of Judaism accept it.

Yet confusion and uncertainty remain. In the Middle Ages, some rabbis believed in physical resurrection – that at some future time, all who had died would be brought back to life in physical form. But eminent authorities, including Maimonides, thought this was gross superstition.

Jewish theologians were troubled by the problem of reward and punishment. The Torah is clear that God will act justly and fairly. If so, why do the righteous suffer? Why do the evil prosper? One solution to this dilemma was to relegate the question to another realm – the afterlife, where the righteous would win eternal reward, and the wicked would be punished.

But other sages maintained there should be no connection between righteous behaviour and material reward. They taught, "Do not be like servants who serve their master out of expectation for reward. Be rather like servants who serve their master out of love." For them, a reward for doing good robs righteousness of any moral quality. Morality isn't a commercial enterprise.

Another reason for much of the uncertainty about immortality is that Judaism is much more concerned with this life than with any other. Overwhelmingly, Judaism's concern is with this world's problems, and our obligation to bring God's kingdom closer to reality.

Rabbi Joshua Loth Liebman expressed this idea in his brilliant book Piece of Mind. "All men today need the healthy-mindedness of Judaism, the natural piety with which the Jew declares, 'One world at a time is enough.' It is the better part of wisdom to live fully, richly, nobly, here and now, and make possible a society where other men can so live."

It's understandable that in a scientific age, views about immortality would change radically. Albert Einstein declared, "Neither can I believe that the individual survives the death of the body, although feeble souls harbour such thoughts through fear or ridiculous egotism."

A cynic suggested that millions who long for immortality don't know what to do with themselves on a rainy Sunday afternoon.

The irrepressible Woody Allen said, "I don't want to achieve immortality through my work. I want to achieve immortality by not dying."

One of the oldest synagogue practices is for mourners to recite Kaddish in memory of loved ones. This prayer doesn't mention death. It's a declaration of praise to God.

It seems to say there's more "wonder" in life than all our philosophies can fathom. The poet sings it, the artist paints it, the prophet catches it in a vision. We may not be artists, poets or prophets, but we can sense the mystery.

Israel advocacy revamp needed?

Israel advocacy in the United States is managed by a diverse and often confusing array of organizations and interest groups. The American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) is recognized as perhaps the most dominant of the various lobbies that promote Israel's welfare. Then there is the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, which has AIPAC as one of its 51 members and whose members in turn sit on AIPAC's executive committee. The mandates of these two behemoths complement each other, although their principal responsibilities are apportioned in a way that's intended to prevent duplication in the halls of government.

In addition, there are a variety of associated groups within and outside of the Conference of Presidents – and an emerging number of competitors – that have each tried to carve out their particular niche in the broad tapestry of political opinion that strives to nurture the U.S.-Israel relationship. Also included in the mix are a smaller number of independently funded, arguably more academically driven, think-tanks, such as the Middle East Forum and the Israel Project.

But despite what appears to be an impressive, though inevitably cumbersome, lobbying apparatus that represents just about every stripe of political affiliation nationally, the realities at the grassroots level may be different. That's where Jewish federations are empowered to co-ordinate community advocacy.

But there has been dissension, for example, in Indiana, where, last October, a new organization, the Jewish American Affairs Committee of Indiana (JAACI) was established as an alternative to the Jewish Community Relations Council (JCRC), the advocacy arm of the local federation.

What prompted the breakaway, according to columnist Jonathan Rosenblum (Jerusalem Post, May 6), was the "perceived passivity of the traditional communal organizations on Israel." Especially galling were the JCRC's preoccupation with "social justice" issues and its penchant for sponsoring programs that "typically included 'pro-Palestinian' voices to maintain balance," presumably at the expense of a strong and unequivocal pro-Israel position.

My View

Laurence Hart

Other pockets of discontent with what has been described as local federations' "politicization and seeming indifference to Israel's image" have also been simmering in larger centres, such as New York City, Washington D.C., and Philadelphia.

In his article, Rosenblum draws attention as well to campus advocacy, or lack thereof, stating that "nowhere has the failure of the mainstream organizations been more obvious than on university campuses."

Although it remains to be seen how the JAACI initiative plays itself out, what's apparent is that there may be mounting dissatisfaction with the priorities of the federation movement in the United States.

Trends within Canada's Jewish communal agencies, notably the federations, are viewed by some as not that dissimilar from what we're seeing in Indiana and elsewhere. Key points of criticism are directed at what's perceived as the federations' nuanced positions on Israel-related advocacy when such straw men as "local needs," the much misunderstood concept of "tikkun olam," Jewish-Muslim "dialogue," and (usually campus-based) "freedom of speech" become part of the equation.

It's maybe not too much of a stretch to anticipate that, unless our local and national agencies begin to pay more careful attention to what they now tend to dismiss as merely dissident voices, it's possible that the Indiana experiment might find a foothold on their doorsteps.

Lactose intolerant and loving Shavuot

Unlike other Jewish holidays, only one festival, Shavuot, has become synonymous with dairy foods. There are people who would be happy to sit down to a table groaning under the weight of blintzes, kugel, onion soup, quiche and cheesecake. The problem is that they are lactose intolerant, and all that dairy food can leave them with an upset stomach and worse. Or perhaps they can't indulge in dairy because they are watching their cholesterol. What to do? Check out the dairy substitute advice on the web.

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

How serious is lactose intolerance among Jews? Surprisingly high according to a study published in the journal American Family Physician. It says that 60 to 80 per cent Ashkenazi Jews are lactose intolerant. [http://bit.ly/shav21] A study cited by the Wikipedia entry on lactose intolerance suggests that the rate among Sephardi Jews is slightly lower. [http://bit.ly/shav22]

Phyllis Glazer writes in the Jerusalem Post, "soy milk is one alternative to regular milk... Other possibilities are coconut milk, rice milk, oatmeal milk and quinoa milk [though after tasting I personally wouldn't buy any of the last three]." Glazer continues, "For dessert, it's easy to find non-dairy ice creams in every supermarket (non-dairy, but chemical rich). Ichh. But if you're allergic to milk, it doesn't necessarily mean you have to put up with chemical additives, especially when it's so easy and good to make things like 'feta' or 'ricotta' out of wholesome ingredients like tofu." [http://bit.ly/shav23]

Chabad.org presents a blintz recipe with an assortment of non-dairy fillings including apple, nut, low-carb potato and parve "cheese." [http://bit.ly/shav24]

As for that emblematic cheesecake, I came across several recipes that call for tofu cream cheese (a.k.a. Tofutti), along with non-dairy heavy cream and soy milk. [http://bit.ly/shav25] Interestingly, the recipe for Parve at Sinai Cake uses "silken" tofu and advises against a cream cheese substitute product like Tofutti. This cake "can be made gluten-free, too, with tapioca flour, which is made from cassava, a tuber of the bitter variety of yucca." [http://bit.ly/shav26]

As Prevention.com points out, levels of lactose intolerance can vary and some people can tolerate (and enjoy) aged cheese like cheddar or Swiss. That's what they put into their Portobello Personal Pizza Pies. There are recipes for Cheesy Baked Ziti with Less Cheese (with lactose-reduced or lactose-free milk) and Greek Salad ("Feta cheese, cottage cheese, farmer cheese, sour cream, and cream cheese seem to be medium-lactose products that can often be eaten in small amounts.") [http://bit.ly/shav27]

Finally, a halachic reality check. If dairy makes you ill, don't feel guilty about skipping it. As the Aish HaTorah rabbi says: "Eating dairy on Shavuot is only a custom, whereas 'enjoying yom tov' has the status of Torah law. So when the two ideas conflict... it is better to preserve your enjoyment of the Shavuot holiday and not eat dairy." [http://bit.ly/shav28]

13-year-olds dance their way to the top

Layra Fixman
Intern

The winners of the 2011 Canadian Closed Dancesport Championship, Tony Cooperman and Sabrina Flisfeder, who are both 13, have been dancing more than half their lives.

When Sabrina was in senior kindergarten, she took jazz and ballet, which she loved. When she started ballroom dancing at the age of seven, she didn't like it at first.

Tony was also a reluctant dancer when he began ballroom dancing at the age of six or seven. At the time, he played soccer, swam and took art and piano lessons. His mother, Tania, encouraged him to join a group dance lesson once a week, but at first he wanted to quit because there were more girls than boys.

"I asked him to continue for two more lessons, and if he wants to quit, he will," Cooperman said.

Tony stayed with it and hasn't looked back since. Two years ago, he set aside all his other extracurricular activities and dedicated himself to dance.

Cooperman plans to continue to support her son's dancing. "Tony is doing what he's passionate about, and as a mom, I'm doing everything to support him," she said.

The Dancesport Championship competition was held at the Doubletree by Hilton in Toronto last month. For the event Tony and Sabrina were competing in, there were seven Canadian judges and two American judges.

Sabrina Flisfeder and Tony Cooperman at their ballroom dancing competition.

"It was full of excitement," Sabrina's mother, Elena Gutkin, said. "It was filled with expectations on the part of the dancers."

Tony and Sabrina began dancing together three years ago. Sabrina said that although she doesn't know what she'll do when she grows up, she could never quit dancing because it's a part of her that could never be removed.

"She's very passionate about dancing, but she wants to keep her opportunities open," Gutkin said.

Tony's mother said that her son's goals are more specifically about dance, including becoming a professional dancer and dancing in all major world competitions.

Tony and Sabrina practise at least six days a week, for three hours at a time. Sometimes they practise every day of the week when they're working toward a difficult competition, such as the Junior World Standard competition in Chisinau, Moldova, where they will be representing Canada in October.

For the Dancesport Championship, Tony and Sabrina had to complete five dances in each of the Latin and standard categories. They won second in both those categories, but placed first over all, as they did last year. For all the hard work they did, they came away with a medal and a large trophy.

"Canadians are the milestone for the whole year of very hard work," Gutkin said.

Sabrina said she is relieved that the Dancesport Championship is over, but she is excited for the opportunity to represent Canada again at this year's world championships in Moldova.

Tony and Sabrina are often among the younger dancers at competitions. There are six classes of competitors at the junior level – pre-bronze, bronze, silver, gold, pre-champ and champ. Tony and Sabrina compete at the champ level.

They take standard dance lessons, including waltz, tango, Viennese waltz, foxtrot and quickstep, at the Toronto Ballroom Dance studio in Woodbridge, Ont. They also take Latin dance lessons, including cha-cha, samba, rumba, pasodoble and jive.

Gutkin said that working together has had a positive effect on both Tony and Sabrina and has allowed them to be successful enough to place first for two years in a row in the Dancesport Championship.

"I think they learn a lot from working together," Gutkin said.

She added that they were excited to win their second championship, and they're hoping to some day win a third.

UWO pressured to decline Islamic chair funding

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A group of alumni, faculty and friends of the University of Western Ontario (UWO) hope that a letter protesting a plan to set up a $2-million endowment for a new Islamic studies chair at Huron University College from groups "implicated in violent jihad" will pressure Huron's principal to reject the funding.

The controversy began in March after an announcement by Huron, a college affiliated with UWO, that it will accept funds raised to establish a new Islamic chair in the faculty of theology. The money will be collected in part by the London, Ont.-based Muslim Association of Canada (MAC), and will come from private donors and other Muslim groups, including the Virginia-based International Institute of Islamic Thought (IIIT) and the Islamic Centre of Southwestern Ontario (ICSO).

In April, a letter signed by 26 alumni, faculty and friends of UWO, including associate professor of economics John Palmer and former political science lecturer Rory Leishman, appealed to Huron's interim principal, Trish Fulton, to reconsider her "ill-advised" decision to "accept funding from any organization implicated in violent jihad."

Leishman, a London-based freelance journalist and spokesperson for the signatories, said three of the organizations that are part of the fundraising effort to establish the chair – MAC, IIIT, and the ICSO – are of particular concern.

The letter states that MAC leaders insist the Muslim group is "peaceful, moderate and democratic," but its website says, "We believe that, in the 20th century, the approach of Imam Hassan Al-Banna best exemplifies [a] balanced, comprehensive understanding of Islam."

Al-Banna, the founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, "was an anti-western exponent of violent jihad who called for the eradication of the state of Israel, and as we pointed out in the letter, he is commended in the 1988 covenant of Hamas for having declared that 'Israel will continue to exist until Islam will obliterate it, just as it obliterated others before it,'" Leishman told The CJN.

MAC's president, Dr. Wael Haddara, a UWO medical professor, told the National Post his group is only interested in Al-Banna's theology and not his politics, and that MAC has no ties to the Brotherhood.

Leishman said he also takes issue with the Islamic Centre of Southwestern Ontario, because it's headed by Assem Fadel, 75, who is also president of the World Islamic Call Society's (WICS) Canadian branch, which recently had its charitable status revoked by the federal government.

According to a May 7 Ottawa Citizen article, government files revealed that WICS was established as a front by Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi to fund terrorist plots, including the failed 2007 plot to blow up John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York.

According to government documents, money was wired to Fadel's personal bank account from Gadhafi's "jihad fund," transferred to the WICS bank account in Canada, and then to bank accounts of known terrorists, the Citizen reported.

Upon hearing WICS had been linked to the JFK plot, Fadel told the Citizen, "The allegations are unbelievable," adding that money from Gadhafi's "jihad fund" was transferred into his bank account before being deposited into the charity's account, because the deposit was in U.S. funds.

"The charity doesn't have a U.S. bank account, so the money came to me and I distributed the money as directed by the mother organization in Libya," Fadel said.

PIJ considered a terrorist organization

The letter to Fulton also gave examples of the IIIT's brush with terrorism.

"In 2003, Shaykh Taha Jabir al-Alwani, a co-founder and former president of the IIIT, was cited as an unindicted, co-conspirator in the trial of Sami al-Arian, an Islamist activist who served a 57-month prison sentence in the United States for conspiring to channel funds to the Palestinian Islamic Jihad (PIJ)."

The PIJ is considered a terrorist organization by Public Safety Canada, which describes it as "one of the most violent Palestinian terrorist groups."

In a sworn affidavit filed in 2003, David Kane, a senior special agent with the U.S. Custom Service, referred to al-Alwani and IIIT's founding president AbdulHamid AbuSulayman as "ardent supporters" of PIJ and Hamas.

"They have repeatedly voiced their ideological support, and I've seen repeated instances of their financial support," Kane wrote.

Trish Fulton

Fulton, who responded to the letter on April 7, said that she was "aware of the allegations against IIIT," but said the plan to fund the endowment "was approved by our executive board after a thorough due diligence process."

She added that the process included "reviewing the outcomes of the various decisions that were before the U.S. District Courts dealing with IIIT and its members."

She added that there is no credible evidence that MAC's objective is anything other than "[To establish an Islamic presence in Canada that is balanced, constructive and integrated."

Leishman said he considers Fulton's response to his group's concerns to be a "brush off," adding that it's reckless for Huron "to accept funding from an organization that has been tainted and associated with terrorism, as has the IIIT."

In a statement, Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, said if the money is tied to terrorist groups, it's cause for serious concern. "Funds that are derived from organizations associated or affiliated with known extremist groups tarnish the integrity of the academic institutions concerned. Such funding also raises questions about the potential influence of such groups on a Canadian campus," he said.

Leishman said that despite Fulton's promise that the chair will be chosen by the executive board and the dean of theology, the letter signatories are "not at all reassured by that, given that... he who pays the piper calls the tune."

Fulton told The CJN that she takes the signatories' concerns very seriously, and when she received the letter in April, it did cause her to re-evaluate her decision, "if only to respond effectively to their concerns. Like any other university, we follow a protocol with respect to any donations that we receive... The particular allegations that were raised in the letter were not new to us. We had thoroughly investigated them in the past."

She said that the Muslim Brotherhood has "nothing to do with our chair in Islamic studies in theology, nor with MAC or IIIT... They think that the teachings of Hassan Al-Banna are appropriate to guide the context of Muslims integrating into modern society."

She added that Al-Banna was assassinated in 1949 and that the concerns that people have with the Brotherhood, "particularly the militant wing of it, are current concerns. To me they don't connect logically to Hassan Al-Banna."

But Leishman said he thinks Fulton is "being willfully blind to the truth on that. We pointed out to her the character of Al-Banna and she just ignored it. I think that is just irresponsible."

Fulton said that if the allegations that the groups had ties to terrorist organizations were true and accepted as fact, she would decline the funding.

"If something were to come up after the fact, we would do the right thing," she said.

Jewish orgs set up Slave Lake crisis fund

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Ve'ahavta has set up a crisis fund to help the residents of Slave Lake, Alta., recover from the disastrous wildfire that devastated their town over the May 14-15 weekend.

Many of Slave Lake's approximately 7,000 residents lost their homes, and the fire wiped out many buildings and community properties. About 105,000 hectares of land have been scorched and destroyed.

The Toronto-based Jewish humanitarian non-profit organization announced late last week that it had set up the fund in co-operation with the Jewish Federation of Edmonton, under the auspices of the organization's new Canadian Jewish Coalition for Disaster Relief (CJCDR).

At present, the coalition is a collection of various "local Toronto synagogues" and individuals who "wish to give quietly," said Seymour Epstein, Ve'ahavta's director of international & education department.

Epstein said his organization and the Edmonton federation want to help with "secondary and tertiary" response efforts for Slave Lake residents.

This help will include distributing gift cards to residents through the local Salvation Army for use at the local mall – one of the few buildings that survived the fires – and donating books to help restore and restock the town's library once it's rebuilt.

"This is a Jewish effort. Jews care about books and reading... we can help them in this regard," Epstein said, adding that this was still just "an idea which hasn't been settled yet."

Local authorities in Slave Lake guess it may be weeks before residents are allowed back to salvage what's left of their homes and begin rebuilding.

Epstein said Ve'ahavta will keep the crisis fund open for "a few weeks" until things normalize in Slave Lake.

"The Edmonton federation will be the main co-ordinator on the ground for our relief efforts," he said.

Russ Joseph, CEO of the Edmonton federation, told The CJN his community wanted to come forward and help in any it could.

Edmonton's Jewish community has approximately 5,000 people, he said. While there is no "significant presence" of Jews in Slave Lake, the relief effort "has everything to do with tikkun olam," Joseph added.

"This hits close to home and we feel the need to respond. We have an obligation to try and help... and make a difference in the lives of some of the people in Slave Lake."

Slave Lake is about 250 kilometres north of Edmonton.

At The CJN's deadline, the CJCDR Slave Lake fund had only accumulated "a few hundred dollars" 24 hours after being announced, Epstein said, noting that it was still very early.

Alan Goldman is a disconnected Jew who becomes a new father—only to learn that his new son is not technically a Jew as he married out of the faith. If he could just figure out what relevance Judaism has in his own life, he'd be able to help his son find his place in the Jewish world. This film documents a journey that brings Goldman face to face with a variety of eclectic Jews who have reconnected to their faith.

Enjoy the traditional Shavuot dish

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

"Honey drips from your lips, my bride; honey and milk lie under your tongue". (Song of Songs 4:11)

What could be more traditional for Shavuot than blintzes?

BLINTZES

3 eggs
2 tbsp. oil
1-1/4 cups milk
1 cup flour
1-1/2 tbsp. sugar
dash of salt

Mix the eggs, oil, and milk in a large bowl. Whisk in the flour, sugar, and salt.

Heat a small amount of oil in a non-stick frying pan. When the pan is really hot, pour in about 1/4 cup batter and tilt the pan to cover the bottom with the batter. Cook briefly, until the bottom of the pancake is lightly browned. Lift the pancake out of the pan carefully and place on a paper towel. Repeat process until all the batter has been used. It probably won't be necessary to re-oil the pan after each pancake. See the note below about low-fat blintzes. Pancakes can be stacked, but keep pile covered with another paper towel.

Low fat blintzes: To cut down on the fat in this recipe, use skim milk and egg substitutes instead of whole eggs. With a non-stick frying pan, little to no oil should be necessary. I usually brush the pan once at the beginning (pastry brush dipped in canola oil) and often don't have to do it again. But it takes practice – beginners may need to oil the pan more frequently. Cooking sprays also work to help keep the pancakes from sticking to the pan.

Cheese Filling:
2 cups cottage cheese (low-fat and nonfat work fine)
1/2 cup plain yogurt (optional)
1 egg or 2 egg whites or 1/4 cup egg substitute)
3 to 4 tbsp. sugar
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
lemon rind (optional)

Blueberry Filling:
blueberries (fresh or frozen)
corn starch
granulated Sugar

The sugar gives it a little sweetness, the cornstarch makes a nice blueberry syrup. Proportions aren't enormously important. Mix the corn starch and sugar and toss the blueberries in the dry mixture. If you like kind of soupy blueberry mush, use more of the dry mixture.

Strawberry Filling:
About the same as the blueberry mix, except use strawberries. Sliced strawberries are better than whole strawberries for this use. If you are using fresh strawberries, be sure to save some to spoon over the top after cooking.

Lemon Filling:
1 package (8 oz.) cream cheese, softened
1 lemon
1/2 cup powdered sugar
1/4 tsp. vanilla extract
1 can mandarin oranges, drained
1/2 cup chopped and toasted almonds, divided
2 tbsp. butter

Wash and grate lemon zest from one lemon. Squeeze lemon juice. In a small bowl, add lemon zest, lemon juice, and sugar to cream cheese. Beat mixture until light and fluffy. Gently fold in drained orange sections and half of the almonds. Note: If you know you'll be using lemon filling for your blintzes, when you make the pancakes, optionally add 1 tablespoon lemon juice to the batter.

Instructions for Assembling Blintzes

Okay, you've got your blintz pancakes, you've got some filling and now you need to put them together. Clear a nice large work space and make sure you have the following:

- The stack of blintz pancakes, covered with a paper towel.
- The filling and a spoon.
- A plate or other area to fold and stuff blintzes on.
- A large baking pan in which to place finished blintzes. Brush the bottom of the pan with melted butter or spray it with cooking spray before you begin.

Take one blintz pancake (cover your stack again) and put it on your plate or work area. Put a dollop (I just love precise cooking terms) of filling on the pancake toward the end nearest you.

Fold the edge nearest you up over the filling, fold over the sides toward the middle, then roll it up (away from you). Place the blintz in the pan with the loose edge down. That's all there is to it! Refrigerate or freeze at this point if you wish.

To bake: Brush the tops of the blintzes with melted butter or spray with cooking spray and bake at 350 for 30 minutes. Serve hot with sour cream, applesauce, and fresh fruit. (Blintz Fillings: Fills 12-16 pancakes, depending on how generous you are with the filling.)

How can you deepen your empathy for others?

Empathy is one of those values that I was lucky enough to learn at an early age from my beloved dad. He has always been a kindly sort who really empathized with others, always giving you the feeling that he was right with you on whatever your journey might be.

This is one of those marvellous virtues, especially when it is heartfelt and genuine. Sometimes we can over-empathize, but that is still a happier problem than being unable to step into another person's shoes and feel what they are going through. Some people just don't have that capacity or the desire to develop it. However, more and and more, researchers are discovering that empathy is a necessary ability that will deeply increase not only your professional but your personal fulfilment as well. This is beautifully outlined in Daniel H. Pink's book, A Whole New Mind: Why Right Brainers Will Rule the Future.

There is even evidence that empathy is reshaping medicine more directly. There's a wonderful story in Pink's book, in which two postal workers went to different health care professionals complaining of symptoms they believed were related to being exposed to anthrax. They both complained of feeling achy and ill.

The first doctor dismissed the patient's symptoms and didn't prescribe antibiotics, and sent the patient home with orders to take some Tylenol. A few days later, the patient died of anthrax.

The other doctor empathized with the patient, even though she wasn't entirely sure he had what he suspected. Nonetheless, she gave the man a prescription for Cipro, the antibiotic that is prescribed for anthrax, and instead of just sending him home, she kept him at the hospital and referred him to an infectious disease specialist. As it happened, the man did have anthrax, and the doctor's empathy, intuition and willingness to really listen to her patient saved the man's life.

As Pink writes, "To empathize, you need some degree of attachment in order to recognize that you are interacting with a person, not an object, but a person with feelings and whose feelings affect your own."

In evaluating medical students, the board that accredits its medical schools now makes communicating empathetically a factor in a student doctor's overall evaluation. According to Pink, actress Megan Cole actually travels to medical schools all across the United States teaching a course called "The Craft of Empathy." As Pink describes it, "In the class, she instructs doctors-in-training how to use nonverbal cues, such as facial expression, intonation, body language, as well as other acting techniques to better grasp what ails patients and to better convey concern for them. Jefferson Medical College in Philadelphia has even developed a measure for this aptitude called the Jefferson Scale of Physician Empathy. (JSPE). That is, all other things being equal, a patient was more likely to get better with an empathic doctor than with a detached one."

This also works with parenting, teaching, coaching sports or any other kind of interaction. I am not suggesting that the hockey coach say, "There, there, you dear boy, you really tried hard to score, you poor thing," but you get the point.

As psychologist Daniel Goleman once said: "Self-absorption in all its forms kills empathy, let alone compassion. When we focus on ourselves, our world contracts as our problems and preoccupations loom large. But when we focus on others, our world expands. Our own problems drift to the periphery of the mind and so seem smaller, and we increase our capacity for connection – or compassionate action."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Bereavement series planned

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Temple Har Zion is sponsoring the first of a community-oriented, three-part series on bereavement, 7:30 p.m., June 9 at the temple.

Paulette Volgyesi, chair of the temple's chesed committee and a member of Temple Har Zion for 30 years, said that most bereavement seminars focus on small groups and touch different aspects of grieving. "This time, we're striving to outreach to the community at large."

As her congregation grows, she said, "we are aging. In the past three years, we have sent out 161 letters to members who have experienced loss.

"The experience of death is difficult and can't be avoided. We're often too involved or overwhelmed by our feelings to tap into the spiritual and emotional potential of this experience."

The goal of the seminars are twofold, she said. "[We want] to offer this service to the community, and facilitate an ongoing bereavement group [that could] meet regularly at the temple."

Topics to be covered include suicide, explaining death to children, Jewish perspectives on death and dying, and understanding your emotions and rejoining the world.

The June 9 lecture features Mary Vachon, a nurse, clinical sociologist, psychotherapist, researcher, educator and cancer survivor.

She will present an overview of the grief process, said Volgyesi, "and facilitate a dialogue which we hope will be ongoing. Based on the audience's response to our feedback sheet, we will plan our next sessions. We want to tailor to the needs of the community."

For information, e-mail Volgyesi at paulette.volgyesi@rogers.com.

Digesting Obama's speech

By Ron Kampeas
JTA

WASHINGTON (JTA) — Within hours of President Barack Obama's Middle East policy speech, Israeli leaders and Jewish groups on the left and right were picking through his remarks on Israel, alternately praising, fretting and criticizing.

The big news was that Obama called for negotiations based on the pre-1967 lines, with land swaps.

"We believe the borders of Israel and Palestine should be based on the 1967 lines with mutually agreed swaps, so that secure and recognized borders are established for both states," he said.

That prompted a round of fretting in Israel and among some American Jewish groups: Why did he say 1967 instead of 1949, when Israel's armistice lines were established? Why did Obama bring up borders at all? Is there a difference between "lines" and "borders?"

Obama also said negotiations should start by focusing on territory and security; the status of Jerusalem and the question of Palestinian refugees would come later. That prompted another round of fretting about those two issues.

But there was also relief. Israel and Jewish groups were pleased Obama said he's not happy about Fatah's pact with Hamas. He talked about Israel as a Jewish state, and rejected "delegitimization." He talked about a demilitarized Palestine.

What was missing in all the quarterbacking was the bigger picture: Obama talked about Israeli-Palestinian peace as part of his larger speech on U.S. policy in the region because he believes consideration of the Middle East is impossible without advancing Israeli-Palestinian peace.

U.S. President Barack Obama

"At a time when the people of the Middle East and North Africa are casting off the burdens of the past, the drive for a lasting peace that ends the conflict and resolves all claims is more urgent than ever," Obama said. "That's certainly true for the two parties involved."

Obama believes U.S. interests in the region will be advanced through democratization and development, but that it won't happen unless the Israelis and the Palestinians get it together.

The rebuke to Israelis and Palestinians for failing to reach an accord was implicit but unmistakable at a time when the Palestinians and Israelis appear determined to go divergent ways. Israel's government would prefer incremental advances to an interim solution, while the Palestinians appear to be seeking unilateral statehood by September.

The rebuke is all the sharper on the eve of a visit to Washington by Benjamin Netanyahu; the Israeli prime minister had hoped the meeting would help restore the focus to the threat of Iran.

Netanyahu's statement in response to Obama's speech knocked back the president's key demands, point by point.

"The viability of a Palestinian state cannot come at the expense of the viability of the one and only Jewish state," Netanyahu said, a direct reference to Obama's call for a "viable Palestine, a secure Israel."

The Israeli leader went on to make it clear that the speech did not go far enough in extending reassurances that the Obama administration would protect Israel's interests during negotiations.

Netanyahu expressed disappointment

But, even if we somehow got to the table – say, the Fatah-Hamas deal collapses and the Palestinian Authority withdraws its UN initiative – Obama's own conditions could make an interim agreement impossible. Those conditions include Palestinian recognition of Israel as the homeland of the Jewish people – which the PA says it will never do. And it includes serious security arrangements for Israel – in Obama's words, allowing Israel to defend itself "by itself." Given that, under an interim agreement, Israel would be withdrawing to fragile borders while the conflict remains unresolved, those security arrangements would need to be severe. They would include an Israeli military presence along the Jordan River – which the Palestinians have likewise vetoed – and on West Bank hilltops overlooking greater Tel Aviv.

What, then, should Netanyahu say in response to the speech?

He should say yes to the vision, which includes key elements of his own position. Obama's call for Palestinian recognition of a Jewish state is a victory for Netanyahu, who was mocked by the international community and by the Israeli left for insisting on precisely that precondition. Obama's powerful endorsement of the need to preserve Israel's ability – not just abstract right – to defend itself is an opening for Netanyahu to press his case for an Israeli military presence along the Jordan River, Israel's line of first defence in the event of unforeseen regional threats.

Palestinians carry a member of Hamas security forces as they celebrate the reconciliation agreement earlier in the month between Fatah and Hamas. Yossi Klein Halevi, whose analysis appears on page one, points out that the Palestinian agreement makes negotiations for the time being between Israel and the Palestinian Authority impossible. [Flash90 photo]

In a statement following Obama's speech, Netanyahu expressed disappointment in the president's failure to reiterate long-standing American policy against a Palestinian right of return to the Jewish state. Yet that should not be a reason for rejecting Obama's speech. By deferring both the fate of Jerusalem and right of return to a final negotiating phase, Obama has chosen to chastise neither PA leader Abbas for his insistence on right of return nor Netanyahu for his insistence on a united Jerusalem under Israeli rule.

A final agreement would stipulate Jerusalem as the capital of two states. And it would stipulate Palestinian right of return being fulfilled exclusively within the borders of a Palestinian state – without complicated formulas and slippery numbers games and other tricks currently being promoted by the Palestinian leadership and their supporters.

If I were Netanyahu, I wouldn't lose any sleep over the right of return or, for that matter, the status of united Jerusalem. In fact, in the unlikely event that Obama's vision of an interim agreement is ever implemented, the result might well be the permanent deferment of a permanent solution, leaving the Palestinians to dream about Haifa and Jaffa, and Israel to continue maintaining a united Jerusalem.

Speech was a 'net gain'

Netanyahu wanted Obama to go as far as President George W. Bush did in 2004.

"Prime Minister Netanyahu expects to hear a reaffirmation from President Obama of U.S. commitments made to Israel in 2004, which were overwhelmingly supported by both Houses of Congress," the statement said.

In his letter that year, Bush called it "unrealistic" to expect Israel to return major population centres, although he, like Obama, said the final-status negotiations should include mutually agreed land swaps. Netanyahu apparently wants to hear the same moral support for retaining some settlements that his predecessor, Ariel Sharon, extracted from Bush.

Also of concern for Netanyahu was how Obama left out Bush's rejection of a Palestinian "right of return." All Obama would say was that the issues of refugees and Jerusalem were "wrenching and emotional" and should be left for later.

Abraham Foxman, the Anti-Defamation League national director, praised the speech as a "strong outline of principles" but said Obama didn't get what the stakes of the refugee issue are for Israel.

"Jerusalem is emotional, yes," he said. "Refugees is not emotional – it's strategic."

In Canada, Jewish community reaction was swift.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), said he didn't believe Obama's comments signalled "a departure from positions articulated by previous U.S. governments."

"Obama made important references to Israel as a Jewish state, the incompatibility of a rejectionist Hamas as a partner and the non-militarized character of any future Palestinian entity," Fogel said.

He added: "Although he dismissed the legitimacy of a Palestinian unilateral declaration of independence, the one area of special concern is Obama's failure to reaffirm that Palestinian statehood cannot be treated as a discrete goal from an 'end of conflict' peace agreement with Israel."

Fogel said that overall, he believed Obama's comments were a "net gain" for Israel, elements of which Netanyahu can use "to present a credible approach towards achieving peace when he visits Washington next week."

Meanwhile, Andrew MacDougall, press secretary to Prime Minister Stephen Harper said Canada "is committed to a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East, whereby two states live side by side in peace and security. We note President Obama's speech with interest and look forward to joining G-8 leaders for discussions on the current situation in the Middle East and North Africa" on May 26 and 27 in Deauville, France.

Arrest of IMF head shakes France's Jews

Country's top presidential contender charged in New York

Devorah Lauter
JTA

PARIS — Shock waves continue to ripple throughout France as Dominique Strauss-Kahn, considered the likely Socialist party candidate to challenge President Nicolas Sarkozy in French presidential elections next year, remains in a New York City jail on charges of sexual assault.

Saturday's arrest of Strauss-Kahn appears to significantly change the political playing field in France, as some recent polls had showed that the 62-year-old head of the International Monetary Fund was the most popular among those considered to be possible presidential contenders.

It also represents a particularly harsh blow for many in France's Jewish community.

Dominique Strauss-Kahn

Strauss-Kahn – popularly known by his initials, DSK – has been outspoken about his Jewish identity in a country where politicians typically are mum about their religion. He also has expressed feelings of attachment to Israel in the past, all the while maintaining a measured distance from actively participating in Jewish institutions, according to Jewish leaders.

"We lost a friend," said Rabbi Michel Serfaty, president of the Jewish-Muslim Friendship of France. "It's true that the Jewish community has a friend in Sarkozy," as well as among other Socialist party leaders, "but with DSK there was no doubt he was a member of the community, interested in Israel, that we have lost."

Among the large Jewish community in Sarcelles, a suburb north of Paris where Strauss-Kahn was a former mayor, the emotion was palpable.

"It is very painful for us," said Marc Djebali, vice-president of the Sarcelles Jewish community. "I know him well. I've even seen him seduce a woman, but it was always with gentleness. He is someone who is very warm, and we never felt any problems of violence from him."

Strauss-Kahn has pleaded not guilty to felony counts including sexual assault and attempted rape. He was denied bail Monday by a Manhattan court and is in New York's Rikers Island prison complex awaiting a grand jury hearing.

The charges were filed following accusations by a 32-year-old chambermaid at a Sofitel hotel in Manhattan. The chambermaid said that when she entered to clean Strauss-Kahn's room Saturday afternoon, he came out of the bathroom naked, pushed her onto the bed, assaulted her and forced her to perform oral sex, according to Paul Browne, deputy New York City police commissioner.

In France, Strauss-Kahn reportedly has a reputation for "running after skirts," and he may face an additional sexual assault investigation here, where journalist Tristane Banon is now expected to press charges against him for an incident she claims took place in 2002, according to her lawyer.

While some Strauss-Kahn supporters are asking whether the expected front-runner for the presidency was a victim of conspiracy, Strauss-Kahn himself speculated in a recent interview with the left-wing daily Liberation that he might face three particular difficulties if he were to run for president: "Money, women and the fact I am Jewish," he said.

While some are concerned that the incident could unleash anti-Semitic sentiment in France, Marc Knobel, a researcher at the French Jewish umbrella group CRIF, said he had not found any significant reference to Strauss-Kahn's religion in connection with his arrest.

On the contrary, "everybody knew he was Jewish, and that didn't prevent him from being the most popular candidate in France," said Richard Prasquier, the president of CRIF. "And that says something about France. Today we find it completely normal that a Jew can become president."

Nevertheless, earlier this year a member of Sarkozy's UMP party was accused of alluding to Strauss-Kahn's Jewish roots and causing a political row when he said on French radio that the IMF leader "doesn't embody the image of France, the image of rural France that we like, and to which I'm attached."

With the popular IMF leader off France's political playing field, the new head of the far-right National Front Party, Marine Le Pen, is among those who are likely to profit, political analysts say. The prospect alarms many French Jews, who often consider the National Front to be antisemitic, though Le Pen has tried to project a new image for the party, which was founded by her father.

Jean Viard, senior analyst at the Paris political research centre Cevipof, said that if Strauss-Kahn is convicted, it will both help Sarkozy in the 2012 election and "it increases the chances Marine Le Pen will make it to the second round of presidential elections."

"It will very strongly shake up the political landscape," he said.

Toronto woman to donate kidney in Israel

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It's been seven months of medical exams, blood tests and false starts, but if all goes according to plan, some time in the next few weeks Toronto oleh Marci Rapp will be wheeled into the operating room of the Beilinson Hospital in Petach Tikvah and donate one of her kidneys to a complete stranger.

Marci Rapp

It's considered an "altruistic donation," though she's not a complete stranger with the recipient any more. Over the course of the seven month marathon, Rapp has gotten to know the 48-year-old mother of six and her family quite well.

It turns out that like herself, the recipient is an immigrant from Canada, having made the move some 30 years ago from Montreal. Although she won't release the woman's full name, she asks well-wishers to pray for the recovery of Shulamit Shoshana bat Ronia and for her (Masha bat Shoshana) as well.

In a telephone interview from Israel, where she runs a swimwear business, Rapp said a few years ago she had no idea that organ donations were even permitted in Judaism. But a confluence of incidents brought her to the brink of the momentous event.

Scanning her e-mail one day, she came across a message from Chaya Lipschutz, an American kidney donor who has taken it upon herself to solicit donations for Jews in need. Around the same time last summer, Rapp came across an article in an Aish HaTorah e-magazine in which Lori Palatnik, an American, wrote about her organ donation as a "kidney mitzvah."

Then she learned that Leah Golomb, the woman who'd been leading a weekly shiur, or Torah lesson, for the three years Rapp has been in Israel, scrambled to raise $100,000 to fly to South Africa to receive a donated kidney.

The stories inspired her. "I respect her," she said of Golomb. "I look up to her as I do to Palatnik. These are religious women and they're saying it's okay to do it."

The more she considered it, the more she became convinced it was the right thing to do. Now, she looks at the surgery "as a very spiritual thing for me. I feel God gave me a healthy body so I could do this."

Lipschutz put her in touch with Rabbi Avraham Heber in Israel, a kidney recipient who founded Matnat Chaim – Gift of Life. He helped locate a 42-year-old mother of nine who urgently needed a donation. During that time, she met the woman and her mother, who took charge of the process and would arrange early morning pickups at her home in Jerusalem to take her for tests in Petach Tikvah. It turned out the family suffered from a genetic disorder that affected the kidneys. The mother had already donated one kidney to her son, but both her daughters likewise needed kidneys. Another oleh, Judith, who asked her last name not be used, immigrated from Scotland, and was found to provide the 42-year-old with a kidney. That operation was concluded successfully right around Passover. Rapp, it turned out, was well suited to the older sister as well.

Going through the process, she and Judith became fast friends, discussing their decisions and weighing the spiritual and medical issues they faced. Rapp learned that donors statistically don't have their lives shortened nor is their health affected after recovering.

Most religious donors, Rapp said, "feel God gave us two kidneys to donate one and save a life."

"I'm 57-years-old and despite my aches and pains, I'm considered healthy to do this. I see it as a sign that that's what I've been put on this earth to do.

"To save a life. I find that awesome."

Her husband, Harold, "has been pareve (neutral) on this, as has Judith's husband. They're worried about our health and loss of income, but they didn't say no."

Making the decision easier for her was the rapport she developed with the recipient. "We feel very strongly that we're fortunate the recipient is English-speaking, religious and a former Canadian.

"That's important for me, there was a connection and we understood each other. We're in the same world."

Rapp said she and Judith have spotted weaknesses in the Israeli medical system. They would like to see the entire process speeded up from seven months to two or three and the postponements eliminated – she's been told several times to be ready to donate, only to be informed the operation had to be delayed. They'd also like to see it become easier for English speakers to donate.

For more information, contact Rapp at marci@bezeq-int.net or visit www.kidneymitzvah.com.

Israel Briefs

Israel denies Russian spy charges

Russian government claims that Israel's military attaché to the country was spying are unfounded, the Israeli army said. "The IDF Military Attaché and Ministry of Defence representative in Russia, Col. Vadim Leiderman, was held aback by a surprise investigation by the Russian government last week on suspicion of spying," said a statement Wednesday by the Israel Defence Forces Spokesman's office. "He was taken to the headquarters and released after a short while due to diplomatic immunity because of his position." Leiderman reportedly was arrested last week at a coffee shop in Moscow, where he was meeting with a Russian military officer. He and his family were given 24 hours to leave the country. He has been in Israel since last weekend. "Defence officials in Israel did a thorough, deep check on Col. Leiderman and discovered the claims were unfounded. Col. Leiderman is currently in Israel and underwent a security investigation by defence forces over the weekend," the statement said.

Katsav prison sentence delayed

The start of former Israeli President Moshe Katsav's prison sentence on rape and sexual assault convictions will be delayed pending his appeal. The ruling last Wednesday by Israel's Supreme Court delayed Katsav's seven-year term, which had been scheduled to begin May 8. "It cannot be said that prospects for Katsav's appeal are baseless, and this is being said without concluding anything on the matter," Justice Yoram Danziger ruled, according to Ynet. The 300-page appeal suggested that it would be undignified for Katsav to show up at the Supreme Court for his appeal in handcuffs, according to reports. The appeal also asked that "weighty consideration should be given to the fact that Katsav served as the president of the state and Israel's official representative at home and abroad." Two years before the verdict was handed down, Katsav declined what was seen as a lenient plea bargain – one that dropped the rape charges for lesser charges and likely would have left him with a suspended sentence – saying that he wanted to clear his name in court.

Obama extends Syrian freeze

U.S. President Barack Obama extended a freeze on Syrian assets to the country's government and its entire leadership. The order issued last Wednesday was the most expansive yet targeting Syria, naming President Bashar Assad and including any "senior official of the government of Syria" or "any agency or instrumentality of the government of Syria, or owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by the government of Syria or by an official or officials of the government of Syria." The order cites "Syria's continuing escalation of violence against the people of Syria – including through attacks on protesters, arrests and harassment of protesters and political activists, and repression of democratic change, overseen and executed by numerous elements of the Syrian government." It essentially cuts off Syria from the United States and bans any U.S. business from trading with Syria's government or its leaders. Israeli and U.S. officials have said there has been a sea of change in attitudes toward Syria since its brutal crackdown launched earlier this month against democracy protesters, and since it helped facilitate a breach by Palestinian protesters of its border with Israeli forces on the Golan Heights last Sunday.

Antiquities smuggling thwarted

A retired history professor from the United States was arrested for allegedly smuggling stolen antiquities from Israel and selling them illegally. The American man sold, among other things, bronze and silver coins from the Second Temple period and a 1,500-year-old clay oil lamp. When he was detained at Ben-Gurion Airport for questioning late Monday night, he was found to be in possession of coins, as well as more than $20,000 – considered evidence that he has sold other antiquities during his visit. He admitted to the illegal sales and attempted smuggling, according to a statement from the Customs Authority and the Israel Antiquities Authority. He was allowed to leave Israel after leaving a large bond to ensure that he returns for trial. Antiquities robbers from sites throughout the country allegedly had stolen the artifacts.

Murray Shore has run a popular pharmacy in pretty much the same spot for 30 years, but unlike real estate mavens who believe the three keys to success are location, location, location, his credo is somewhat different.

"It's not location, location, location," he intoned. "It's service, service, service."

It's a formula that appears to be working, as this week, Shore is celebrating the 30th anniversary of his opening.

Going the extra mile for his "patients" has allowed Shore to keep his pharmacy thriving even as independents fall by the wayside to be replaced by big-box stores.

There was a time when medicines were dispensed by owner-operated pharmacies that resembled corner stores, but like the once ubiquitous corner groceries, these have become nearly extinct. Even when Shore was considering opening his pharmacy on Bathurst Street – it currently sits in a small plaza across from the Baycrest Centre – he was asked if that was a good idea.

"How are you going to compete with Shopper's [Drug Mart]?" he was asked. "You know what my answer was? 'How is Shopper's going to compete with me?'"

Treating the people who walked into the store as patients was an important component of his plan to stay afloat. He believes part of that stemmed from his experience working for one year in the pharmacy at Toronto General Hospital. "I saw people as patients, not just customers," he said. "You empathize with the people quite differently."

Plus, Shore is clearly "a people person." He likes to shmooze and he enjoys playing "Jewish geography."

"I'm good at it," he acknowledges.

But is it enough to entice people away from the one-stop shops where you can get a prescription filled, and also buy shampoo, toys for the kids and even a bottle of milk?

Shore eschews the ancillary items that used to stock the shelves of independents.

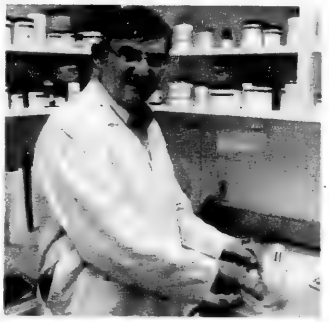
"I'm not a supermarket or a warehouse. I'm a community pharmacy who looks after the patients," he said.

His is strictly a drug store, but about 25 years ago, he added something that has made the business somewhat unique.

He'd received a phone call from a distraught parent living in Thornhill. "Our child needs a special medicine at SickKids and we need to pick it up every week. Can you make it for us?" she asked him.

"I said, 'If they can make it, I can make it.'"

He filled the prescription, saved the family the big shlep downtown, and about a year and a half later, completed a course at a school in Houston to become a "compounding pharmacist."



Murray Shore

The designation entitles him to "tailor the medication to the patient, not the patient to the medication." Fewer than five per cent of pharmacies today can lay claim to the title, he said. Compounding currently makes up 10 to 15 per cent of his business, making the initial investment in Texas well worthwhile. The skill came in handy when a parent asked him to prepare for a child a heart medication that was only 2 milligrams in strength, when prepared tablets started at 10 milligrams.

He's also developed a special cream to address nausea and vomiting in pregnant women – it's absorbed through the skin. He then "educated" doctors that he stocked the product.

He also developed his own diaper rash cream to treat his grandchild years ago. Nothing available at the time seemed to be working. Starting with the traditional zinc oxide formulation, he added a couple of ingredients recommended by a pediatric dermatologist that are not available in commercial products. Menachem's Diaper Cream, named after his grandson, proved quite popular. In fact, "it's huge," he said.

With a clientele that is perhaps 80 per cent Jewish, Shore developed kosher ibuprofen liquids to replace unkosher gel capsules. He developed an analgesic suppository to be used on fast days and a kosher maternity vitamin that has proven quite popular as well.

He offers specialty products and free delivery – he uses a courier service for about 40 per cent of prescriptions – and he does charge a premium.

He will make himself available on weekends if the need is there, and he's found that "people pay for the service and the unique products.

"My business attitude is, God created me to help patients and I try my best at it. Thank God he's allowed me to make a living at it too."

Israeli possible successor to Strauss-Kahn at IMF

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The affair involving International Monetary Fund (IMF) head Dominique Strauss-Kahn may have an unexpected effect on Israel: Israel's central bank governor Stanley Fischer was named as a potential successor to the IMF chief, forced to step down in the wake of rape charges.

Strauss-Kahn was arrested in New York for allegedly assaulting a hotel maid in the city. The arrest rattled Europe, particularly France, where he had been touted as a potential challenger to French President Nicolas Sarkozy.

Currently, first deputy IMF director John Lipsky is filling in for Strauss-Kahn. While the IMF traditionally has been led by a European, pressure is increasing to consider a candidate from a developing country.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel, however, signalled last week she preferred another European at the helm of the IMF, which has become heavily involved in bailouts of struggling euro zone countries Greece, Ireland and Portugal.

Fischer has been mentioned as a potential successor, having served as the IMF's first deputy managing director from 1994 through 2001. Also in his favour are his academic record – he headed the economics department at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where he was U.S. Federal Reserve chair Ben Bernanke's thesis adviser.

Factors that could damage his chances include his age – Fischer is 67 – and the fact an American already heads the World Bank. Fischer was born in Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia) and became an Israeli citizen in 2005, when he took the job as governor of the central bank.

Other people mentioned as potential candidates include former Turkish economy minister Kemal Dervis; French Finance Minister Christine Lagarde; former South African finance minister Trevor Manuel; Bank of Mexico governor Agustin Carstens; Indian economic advisor Montek Singh Ahluwlia; former IMF employee Mohamed El-Erian of Egypt, and former British prime minister Gordon Brown.

The Eichmann trial and Hannah Arendt

Schocken Books' impressive Jewish Encounters series addresses, in its published and forthcoming volumes, subjects as varied as Maimonides, Birobijan and The Dairy Restaurant. The series' modus operandi is to assign a lively subject to an accomplished author, with the goal of offering a short study, light on scholarly apparatus and open to the general reader.

The American Holocaust historian Deborah Lipstadt, who had her own share of unwanted fame when she was sued in British court by Holocaust denier David Irving, has her work cut out for her in The Eichmann Trial. Her challenges include: recounting the events of the trial; examining the influential writings of Hannah Arendt, which were published in The New Yorker in 1963; judging Eichmann's role in the making of the Holocaust; and undertaking to explore the impact of the trial on postwar Jewish identity, Israeli culture and our knowledge of the Holocaust.

Norman Ravvin

Lipstadt's finest accomplishment is her description of the trial itself, of the atmosphere in which it was conducted, the behaviour of the defendant, his defence, the prosecution and the three German-born Israeli judges who oversaw the case.

Lipstadt recounts the details of Eichmann's capture and interrogation with verve and fine detail. She challenges what she judges to be an overly broad indictment, which "charged Eichmann with the 'implementation' of the Final Solution, committing acts of 'extermination' on Jews in Poland at death camps, murdering Jews in the USSR with the Einzatzgruppen, imposing sterilization and abortions on Jews" and more.

The Eichmann Trial also highlights the decision by the prosecution to include among the trial's witnesses 100 Holocaust survivors, whose accounts of wartime suffering did not necessarily touch on Eichmann's own actions, and arguably, were legally extraneous to the case. Yet this approach proved to be among the trial's key legacies, since it introduced survivors' experience to world opinion in a lasting way.

Lipstadt's approach to Arendt's report on the trial is less successful. Readers might feel that this issue, which consumes the book's long final chapter, should be the subject of a separate book. Lipstadt introduces us to the questions associated with Arendt this way: "The cover of the Feb.16, 1963 New Yorker featured an artist's rendering of the recently completed and much-debated Pan Am building looming over the iconic Grand Central Terminal .... Inside was the first of a series of five articles by Hannah Arendt on the trial."

Two of Lipstadt's authorial decisions raise questions: first, her willingness to discuss Arendt's contribution through the lens of accusations that characterize Arendt's work as a scandal, as "wickedness" and distortion; and, second, her decision, after commenting on the influence of the New Yorker on American opinion, to avoid quoting from the essays Arendt published in the magazine. Instead, she relies on the revised and enlarged book, first published in 1964, under the title Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil.

One gets a far richer and more immediate sense of the trial's impact through the original New Yorker pieces. (Readers can access the original issues, now available digitally through the magazine's archive, to appreciate not only the specific character of Arendt's writing, but the strangeness of reading about Eichmann's early visits to killing sites such as Treblinka alongside the bonhomie of early 1960s ads for men's shirts, Ford wagons and RCA electronics.)

Lipstadt's decision not to refer to the original essays contributes to an overall lack of decisiveness with regard to Arendt, and to a tendency to criticize and quibble without directly grappling with what Arendt published nearly two years after sitting in the Jerusalem court room.

The range of Arendt's reportage for The New Yorker is breathtaking. Her access to key sources, like the trial itself, court documents, the major early historiography of Raul Hilberg, and original German texts is deeply affecting. Her tone is measured, yet not without irony, and she has no tendency to treat her subject through overwrought language or shopworn moral claims.

Many of Lipstadt's claims regarding Arendt's views are offered without support and are too loosely linked to the New Yorker essays and the subsequent Eichmann in Jerusalem. Rather, her discussion is peppered with broad, often misleading claims drawn from the "virulent public debate" surrounding Arendt, rather than from what Arendt wrote. A good example of this is Lipstadt's unsupportable argument that Arendt "declared" Eichmann to be a "desk-level bureaucrat who showed little initiative and had few talents." This is a remarkable trivialization of the darkly complicit, self-consumed and amoral figure portrayed in Arendt's New Yorker articles.

It might be best to read The Eichmann Trial, skipping the chapter on Arendt, focusing instead on Lipstadt's careful historian's tableau of Eichmann's role in the Holocaust and his bizarre second act in a glass booth in Jerusalem.

Local artist paints from the heart

Laura Fixman
Intern

Katherine Dolgy Ludwig has come a long way from her first drawings, on the cardboard from her father's laundered shirts.

A Torontonian, she's now part of the international art scene, having exhibited her paintings in shows in the United States and in London, England, as well as in Canada, over the past eight years.

Her latest Toronto show, PaintingFlowerLanguage, runs at the Pearl Gallery in Holy Blossom Temple until July 10.

Dolgy Ludwig has become an artist with a distinct style that she feels people will recognize.

"I have been painting so long that something's taken over that's uniquely mine," she said.

She said she decided to feature watercolour paintings of flowers at Holy Blossom because the show would then be appropriate for all viewers, from small children to older adults. She also wanted to exhibit paintings that are a part of her life, and she thought that showing watercolours of flowers fit with the temple's name.

"The flower is always beautiful," Dolgy Ludwig said. "It doesn't matter what's in the room around it."

She said that her process of painting watercolours is an uncommon one. She starts with what she feels is the most interesting part of the painting and adds whatever she's thinking about as she works. She uses thick lines and doesn't draw what she's going to do beforehand.

"I like my paintings to be really free," she said. "I don't do a lot of pre-planning."

Dolgy Ludwig waited until her four children were old enough to be self-sufficient to begin painting professionally. She travels frequently to New York and London to participate in shows. She said that travelling wouldn't have been possible when her children were younger.

"If I didn't put 110 per cent into painting, I couldn't have made it a full career," she added.

She said she has painted subjects that she feels other artist might ignore. She painted U.S. soldiers for an exhibit at the Pentagon because she felt that was how she could help them. She painted police officers in London, England, and Playboy bunnies in Las Vegas, because she felt they were misunderstood people.

"It was all about showing that they're real people with real lives," Dolgy Ludwig said.

She sees her paintings as a way of expressing the concept of tikkun olam, because she can give back to the community through her painting. She likes the fact that her paintings have a lasting impact on people, and she thinks that is a good way to reach out to the world.

"I like that peoples' children will grow up with my paintings and remember them," she said.

When painting portraits, she often doesn't like to have her subjects formally posed. She prefers to have them in their natural environment, to bring some life to their paintings, she said. She brings her Spiderman painting case when she does portraits because she feels that it puts her subjects at ease.

A series of paintings she did in New York featured dozens of people of various races and religions. She painted sixth-grade classes in public schools and religious groups including a convent of nuns and worshipping Hindus, Orthodox Jews and Arab Muslims. She hopes that people from the three faiths realize that they have a lot in common when they view these paintings. With every exhibit, Dolgy Ludwig hopes that she can help bring different people together, she said.

"It's all about a sense of community," Dolgy Ludwig said. "I also have to remember what I believe is important to paint."

When she attended the Ontario College of Art and Design, she was told many times that flowers and children are not "important" subjects. This was a lesson she had to ignore because she feels that these subjects put the most life into her paintings, she said.

"Whether it's flowers or children, you're always going to feel something," she said.

Dolgy Ludwig counts many people and places among her inspirations. She said that she still continues to apply what she learned from many of her teachers, including the late Canadian artists, Goodridge Roberts and Graham Coughtry. She added that Holy Blossom was a big inspiration to her while she attended. She is happy that her children are still involved in the Hebrew school there.

"I chose Holy Blossom because they have the best teachers in the city," she said. "I wanted my children to like going to Hebrew school."

Although most of her paintings are for shows and take about three weeks to complete, sometimes Dolgy Ludwig is inspired when she doesn't have a show, and finishes one faster. She finds that these often end up being among some of her best paintings.

"Sometimes you get an idea and you just want to make a painting for fun," she said.

Philip Roth wins Booker Prize

JTA

Jewish author Philip Roth has won the Man Booker International Prize for the body of work in his more than 50-year-long career.

The biennial award, to be presented next month in London to Roth, 78, was announced last week. The author of the widely read and controversial Portnoy's Complaint has also won two U.S. National Book Awards and a Pulitzer Prize.

Roth is renowned for creating the character Nathan Zuckerman, often considered an alter-ego.

Authors on the shortlist for this year's Booker Prize included Canadian Rohinton Mistry, Philip Pullman, Anne Tyler, and Chinese novelists Wang Anyi and Su Tong. Previous winners include Canadian writer Alice Munro, Nigerian writer Chinua Achebe, and Albanian writer Ismail Kadare.

The annual Man Booker Prize for Fiction is awarded for a single book.

Following the announcement, author and publisher Carmen Callil withdrew from the prize's three-judge panel, citing her displeasure with giving the award to Roth, the Guardian reported, saying he didn't deserve to be on the list.

Show features Jewish-American Songbook's hits

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

To Life, the spirited and entertaining musical currently on offer from the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, presents a briskly paced selection of greatest hits and lesser known but no less pleasing numbers from the Jewish-American Songbook of the 20th century.

Cast members Charlotte Moore, Shawn Wright, Patrick Cook and Gabi Epstein do an admirable job of performing the music of Al Jolson, Sophie Tucker, Eddie Cantor and Fanny Brice in Act 1. Nor do they flag as they move through the distinctly different trajectory of Act 2, which presents many little-known postwar Broadway gems as well as an assortment of songs from Fiddler on the Roof that serve to reinforce the act's "life-cycle" theme.

Early on, show architects Avery Saltzman and Tim French introduce the notion (via a number from Spamalot, the show's only contemporary reference) that any musical endeavour on Broadway cannot possibly succeed without Jews. Even with only piano accompaniment, To Life easily demonstrates the aptness of this thesis. (The two grand pianos that are the set's main decoration are played by Mark Camilleri and Jeffrey Huard.)

Act 1 features, among other trademark numbers, Cantor's Makin' Whoopee and If You Knew Susie, Tucker's Some of These Days, Red Hot Mama and 50 Million Frenchmen Can't Be Wrong, Jolson's April Showers, Mammy and Sonny Boy, and Brice's I'd Rather Be Blue, Second-hand Rose and My Man. While the cast do not pretend to be impersonators and Camilleri as musical arranger is not a period purist, their renditions usually satisfy.

(As if showing the production belongs to our day more than the periods from whence it sprung, the show steers clear of any politically incorrect depiction of Jolson in blackface, yet breezily delivers a funny gay allusion in Cooking Breakfast For the One I Love that would have closed down the house 75 years ago.)

Between the most recognizable iconic songs are a variety of more obscure tunes, many bearing the cheap brilliant sheen of Tin Pan Alley. These amusing numbers include Josephine Please No Lean Upon the Bell, Who Paid the Rent for Mr. Rip Van Winkle, Where Did Robinson Crusoe Go With Friday on a Saturday Night, and Sister Susie's Sewing Shirts for Soldiers.

Besides its somewhat overindulgent homage to Fiddler, Act 2 pays deserving tribute to some lovely and largely forgotten material mined from such Broadway shows as The Rothschilds (Bock-Harnick), The Bar Mitzvah Boy (Styne-Black), Falsettos (Finn) and Funny Girl (Styne-Merrill). The thematic life-cycle approach holds the material together well.

For me, the show-stopper of Act 1 is My Yiddishe Momma, sung in Yiddish and English by Wright and Cook. Anyone who has heard Tucker's Yiddish version knows what a punch the mamaloshen adds to the number, which already has a high emotional quotient. Epstein's lovely emotional rendition of Miss Marmelstein, from I Can Get It For You Wholesale, seemed to be an audience favourite in Act 2.

It wasn't just that the evening's musical compass changed so often and evocatively from major to minor that seemed to make this world première production a success. The draw of its iconic quartet of legendary performers – a veritable Mount Rushmore of show business – is still palpable, as is the genius of composers and lyricists like Gus Kahn, Sammy Kahn, Billy Rose, Sam M. Lewis, et al. (No matter that the show entirely sidestepped Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern and Harold Arlen, and only brought in one Gershwin tune, Swannee.)

To Life plays at the Jane Mallet Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre, through May 29. Tickets, 416-466-7723, www.stlc.com

Bobby Fischer is profiled in a first-rate documentary

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Genius or crackpot?

The late Bobby Fischer was both, judging by Liz Garbus' first-rate documentary, Bobby Fischer Against the World, which opens at the Bell Lightbox on May 27.

Perhaps the greatest champion in the history of chess, Fischer was a strange, quirky, erratic, touchy and unpredictable creature.

The cerebral board game, the object of his obsession, transformed this Jewish boy from Brooklyn into an international celebrity before he had reached the age of 30.

Having defeated the Soviet Union's Boris Spassky for the world championship in 1972, he chose not to defend his title. Fischer became a recluse, conspiracy theorist and, unbelievably enough, a raving antisemite.

The 96-minute film, a collage of news clips, photographs and interviews with people who knew him, charts the trajectory of his life from shy child prodigy to arrogant global superstar.

Fischer, invariably awkward, appears in virtually every frame, answering reporter's questions and making vague, disarming and astonishingly direct observations.

At the core of the movie is the highly anticipated showdown between Fischer and Spassky in Reykjavik, Iceland, a colossal media event that eclipsed news of the raging war in Vietnam.

Born in Chicago in 1943, he was the son of Regina Fischer, a pushy, hard working single mother with communist leanings who was the subject of a thick FBI dossier. His biological father, Paul Nemenyi, was a Hungarian Jewish scientist with whom he had little contact.

Fischer was a lonely child who learned chess when he was six. By 14, he was the U.S. champion, a title he would win seven more times. His ambition was to be world champion.

To Fischer, chess was everything that mattered. "I'm really tied up in chess," he told an interviewer in a grand understatement.

The film moves quickly to the 1972 championship, which was not merely a tournament but a compelling political symbol of the United States' Cold War rivalry with the Soviet Union.

Henry Kissinger, president Richard Nixon's national security adviser, believed that an American victory would be beneficial, not only for the United States but for democracy in general.

Fischer himself, having accused Moscow of slandering him, looked forward to taking on Spassky. Curiously enough, Fischer had to be coaxed into showing up in Iceland for the match. Kissinger had to call Fischer to ensure he would attend.

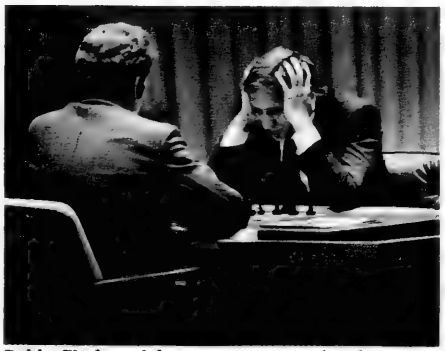
Even after agreeing to play, Fischer was late for the first of 24 games. After losing the first game due to a silly error, he chose not to show up for the second one. In game three, he regained his form and rolled over Spassky.

Spassky roared back, but Fischer triumphed in the legendary sixth game. Such was Fischer's mastery in that memorable game that Spassky stood up and applauded when it ended.

With Fischer having taken the lead by the 21st game, Spassky conceded and Fischer was crowned the world's new champion.

For Fischer, who treasured his privacy, the constant glare of publicity was a problem. Retreating into himself, he grew still more eccentric.

After declining to defend his title, Fischer turned into a nut case. Always paranoic, he feared that the Mossad was trailing him. He read The Protocols of the Elders of Zion – an anti-Jewish tract concocted by the Russian secret police in the early 20th century – and became a full-blown racist.



Bobby Fischer, right, concentrates as he plays Boris Spassky for the world's chess championship in Iceland in 1972.

Fischer was at war with himself.

Garbus, in the rest of her fine film, charts his descent into purgatory, his status as a U.S. fugitive after brazenly flouting United Nations sanctions on Yugoslavia and his sad, final years in Iceland.

Fischer, as she suggests, was a supremely gifted but flawed individual who squandered his talents. He could beat Spassky handily, but he could not conquer the demons that haunted him.

HEBREW BOOK COLLECTION WORTH $25 MILLION BACK ON MARKET AFTER FAILED DEAL

The Valmadonna Trust Library, a treasure-trove of rare Jewish books that includes a complete set of the Babylonian Talmud by 16th-century printer Daniel Bomberg, is back on the market after the collapse of a deal made last December through New York-based Sotheby's auction house.

The collection, which was assembled by diamond merchant Jack Lunzer over the course of 50 years, is valued at an estimated $25 million. It consists of more than 300 handwritten Hebrew documents, some nearly 1,000 years old, and about 13,000 printed Hebrew books. Sotheby's hosted a public viewing of the collection for three weeks last year that drew as many as 4,000 people daily.

According to The Forward and other Jewish news sources, the sale was cancelled after the anonymous buyer refused to keep the collection intact and to make it available to scholars, conditions that were clearly spelled out as part of the sale.

Sharon Lieberman Mintz, curator of Jewish art at the Jewish Theological Seminary Library in New York and a senior consultant for Judaica at Sotheby's, called the Valmadonna "the greatest Judaica library in private hands." She and many others are now expressing hope that some individual or institution with deep pockets will step forward and rescue the collection for the sake of Jewish scholarship.

Cannes ousts 'Nazi' director

JTA

PARIS — The Cannes Film Festival sanctioned director Lars von Trier for expressing sympathy for Hitler and Nazis.

The festival's board of directors on May 19 declared von Trier "persona non grata" and removed him from the festival, but said his new film, Melancholia, remains in competition.

Von Trier described himself as a Nazi who is not against Jews and called Israel "a pain in the ass" during a May 18 festival news conference to promote his film. He later apologized.

The board "firmly condemns these comments," said a May 19 statement by the festival, and it "profoundly regrets that this forum has been used by Lars von Trier to express comments that are unacceptable, intolerable, and contrary to the ideals of humanity and generosity that preside over the very existence of the festival."

"I really wanted to be a Jew, and then I found out that I was really a Nazi because, you know, my family was German, which also gave me some pleasure," the director said in the May 18 news conference.

"What can I say? I understand Hitler, but I think he did some wrong things, yes, absolutely. But I can see him sitting in his bunker in the end. He's not what you would call a good guy, but I understand much about him, and I sympathize with him a little bit. But come on, I'm not for the Second World War, and I'm not against Jews. I am very much for Jews. No, not too much, because Israel is a pain in the ass."

The French Jewish umbrella group, CRIF, said it was "horrified" by the comments, which exemplify "current tendencies to trivialize Nazism."

The sanction "is a welcome action which declares to the world that the suffering of victims is not a fit subject for mockery or casual self-promotion," Elan Steinberg, vice president of the American Gathering of Holocaust Survivors and their Descendants, said in a statement.

"The organizers of the Cannes film festival have eloquently taken a determined moral stand against cavalier expressions of hate and insensitivity to those brutalized by the Nazis - Jew and non-Jew."

Critics have called Von Trier's new film a triumph and it's in the running for the Palme d'Or prize in Cannes for best picture, but his comments could harm his film's chances.

As winters warm up, Golan ski resort doubles as bike park

Eli Ashkenazi
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — For mountain biker Shai Lahat, it took three downhill trips to take the edge off the thrill of hurtling down the slopes of Mount Hermon.

"It's super-fun, there are good trails and some sweet jumps. There's no other place like it in Israel," Lahat said after riding at Bike Park, a biking site at the Hermon Ski Resort on the Golan Heights mountain, which opened recently.

Lahat, the technical coach for Teamisgav, a riding group with 200 members, envisions an expansion of the offerings, with additional trails for different types of bicycling that would attract riders coming from abroad.

The site already has three bicycle trails: a relatively easy one, for learning how to mountain bike and practising technique; and two 4.5-kilometre downhill trails that go from the top to the bottom of the ski site and include jumps and other features.

"The main idea is to take advantage of the infrastructure, the unique topography, the weather and the accessibility of Hermon Ski Resort for bicycling," said Guy Zisser of PeakBike, the company that operates the park.

Bikers use the ski chairlifts to take them, and their wheels, to the top of the trail. An all-day lift ticket costs NIS 135 ($37).

"Several conditions are needed for a bike park, and in addition to suitable topography and accessibility, the chairlift is an important component," Zisser said.

According to PeakBike, there are an estimated 200,000 active mountain bikers in Israel.

But Zisser said it was "impossible to guess how many will come." For now, he's settling for the 10 biking "addicts" who showed up yesterday after hearing about the site's opening.

The general manager of the ski resort, Menachem Baruch, said he had been searching for a partner with a suitable background for years before joining forces with PeakBike.

"We realized a long time ago that we needed to bring mountain biking into the site as a complementary product, and we found the people who could do it," he said.

But though Baruch called the biking "complementary," it could well turn into the ski resort's main activity if the winters continue to be as mild as in the last two years. The resort was open to skiers for only seven days this winter and 15 days the previous one.

"It's sad," said Baruch, though he insisted "the winter activity is still central to Hermon."

The warmer winters may be bad for skiing at Hermon, but Zisser sees the silver lining in the disappearing clouds.

"Considering that Israel's weather allows for mountain biking for seven months out of the year, compared to just a few months abroad, our project is expected to form a complementary activity to the winter and in this way will contribute to increasing tourism in the area in the spring, summer and fall," said Zisser. "The Hermon will operate for a longer period of time as a bike park than as a ski area."

Zisser said there are similar bike parks in Europe, the United States and Canada.

"Soon the site will be associated not only with skiing but also with biking," said Lahat. "The word is already out on the opening, and riders are excited."

Soccer-thon raised funds for Israeli charity

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The summer fundraising season is upon us – at least the one that combines sports with raising money for worthy charities.

A couple of Sundays ago, Beit Issie Shapiro was the beneficiary of a "Soccer-thon," which saw about 60 adults play a five-on-five soccer marathon. Held at the Astra Sports-Plex on Rutherford Road, the event saw players in the 20-40 age range compete in a friendly environment punctuated by the sound of the "vuvuzuela," the South African horn made famous at the 2010 World Cup of Soccer.

The three-hour tournament was played on two side-by-side indoor "fields." The format permitted all teams to play everyone else in a quick-paced game that was capped at 10 minutes, or which ended when one team scored two goals.

Teams consisted of up to 10 players each and each squad was asked to contribute $300 towards the charity.

Team Green were tournament winners, with each player receiving a copy of Start Up Nation, a book by Dan Senor and Saul Singer about Israel's economic innovations.

Proceeds from the tournament were earmarked to Beit Issie Shapiro's home community inclusion program. Beit Issie Shapiro is an agency based in Ra'anana, Israel that provides therapeutic and educational services for children and adults with developmental disabilities. It is also an advocacy organization, promoting the rights of people with special needs as well as their integration in all areas of society.

Some 30,000 Israelis benefit from Beit Issie's efforts.

Last year, the Canadian Friends of Beit Issie Shapiro founded a young professional division, known as BISYP, chaired by Gilad Epstein. Tasked with raising awareness of the Israeli agency and raising funds, it organized the weekend soccer-thon. Last September it sponsored a sushi and wine evening attended by 40 people, and in August it held a Zumba dance event attended by 20 people.

The terraced gardens of the Shrine of the Bab in Haifa.

A thing of spiritual and physical beauty in Haifa

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The Shrine of the Bab, the world centre of the Baha'i faith, is probably the single most impressive landmark in the picturesque Israeli port city of Haifa.

But for Iranian Canadian architect Fariborz Sahba, the shrine is more than just a thing of beauty.

"It is at the heart of our spiritual universe," he said in an interview.

Sahba, a resident of Victoria, B.C., was here last week to talk about the shrine, a topic dear to his heart, at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

His lecture was sponsored by the Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation.

Sahba, 62, spent almost 14 years in Haifa, from 1988 onward, as architect/manager of a major renovation project that enhanced the beauty of the shrine, a substantial complex of ethereal gardens and exquisite buildings stretching about one kilometre from the base of Mt. Carmel to its summit.

He designed the 18 terraced gardens above and below the golden-domed shrine, a Baha'i pilgrimage destination and tourist attraction all rolled into one.

"We changed the heart of the city into something beautiful," said Sahba, who immigrated to Canada from Iran in 1982.

A graduate of Tehran University's School of Fine Arts, he was commissioned to design "a monumental approach" to the shrine, which itself was designed by a Canadian Baha'i, William Sutherland Maxwell, and was completed in 1953.

The shrine, classified as a UNESCO World Heritage site in 2008, contains the remains of Bahaullah, the founder of the Baha'i faith, a monotheistic religion with some six million followers whose members in Iran and Arab states have been marginalized and persecuted.

The Baha'is purchased the land, facing the German Colony, in the early 20th century. Over the years, a garden and an ensemble of buildings were added to the scenic site, which offers panoramic views of Haifa's harbour and the foothills of the Galilee.

Sahba – the designer of a lotus-shaped Baha'i house of worship in New Delhi, India, and the associate architect of Iran's embassy in Beijing, China – worked closely with Israeli horticulturalists, soil and structural engineers and gardeners to create the 18 terraced gardens, consisting of a melange of flower beds, hedges, trees, ornaments, fountains and gravelled paths.

The Israeli national and municipal governments were very supportive of his plans. "They were friends," he said, referring to the officials who extended assistance. "It was a collaborative effort."

The project, which cost around $250 million, was financed by the global Baha'i community.

Finished in May 2001, and the subject of an Israeli postage stamp, the gardens are divided into three zones of seasonal flowers, drought-resistant plants and hardy trees such as eucalyptus and olive.

Sahba travelled all around Israel to learn about native flowers, plants and trees.

In some cases, he bought mature olive trees that farmers intended to uproot, sending special teams of experts to relocate them properly.

"For me, it was a wonderful time and opportunity," he observed, saying that the project was an antidote to the usual dose of bad news coming out of the Middle East in those years.

"Haifa, for the Baha'is, is very important. For us, this is a spiritual garden. We didn't do it for show."

While working on the gardens, Sahba contributed his expertise to the restoration of the crumbling but atmospheric German Colony, which was founded by German evangelical Christians in the last half of the 19th century and abandoned after World War II.

"This project is an ongoing one," he explained. "It will take many years to be fully complete."

Restoration work is also proceeding at the Baha'i gardens in Acre, which is also a UNESCO heritage site, but Sahba is not involved in this project.

HEEBONICS

A Jew walks into a bar... mitzvah

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

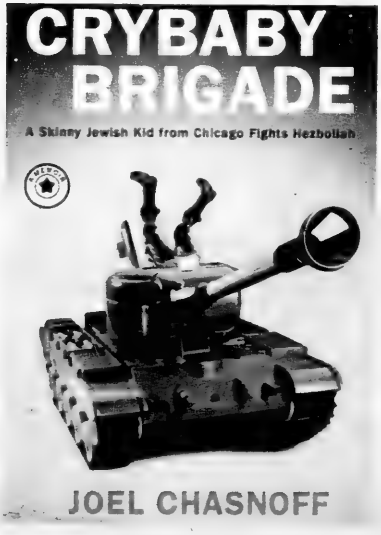
Joel Chasnoff is not your typical standup comedian.

Scratch that. He is your typical comedian, if by "typical" you mean a Chicago-born, Conservative Jewish father of four who recently wrote an autobiographical comedic novel about his time serving in the Israel Defence Forces and has opened for Jon Stewart and Lewis Black.

Titled The 188th Crybaby Brigade: A Skinny Jewish Kid From Chicago Fights Hezbollah (Simon & Schuster), Chasnoff writes about his service as the lone American soldier, then 24, in an IDF tank unit populated by 18-year-old Israeli "mama's boys who feign injuries to get out of guard duty and claim diarrhea to avoid kitchen work" among other ignoble events.

In Toronto last week to perform at a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto "young professionals" night and as the entertainment at a fundraising gala for Robbins Hebrew Academy, Chasnoff has pretty much locked up the Jewish comedy gig as his niche market.

Not that he's intending to pigeonhole himself as a one-trick comedian, mind you. But his keen observational and anecdotal Jewish humour and clever take on the surrealities of growing up Jewish are second to none. Oh, and he works absolutely clean. There's no "blue" in his routine.



Take for instance this joke about holiday foods:

"Jews pervert our holidays with the most disgusting foods ever invented. Take Chanukah. We celebrate the oil lasting for eight days. We commemorate that by eating latkes. A food that has eight times the amount of oil recommended by the Food and Drug Administration. It's a miracle! Here, have a heart attack."

Speaking to Heebonics at his North York hotel last week, Chasnoff said he believes what makes him successful as a comedian is that he never uses his humour to "degrade" the Jewish experience, using it instead to reveal his true Jewish experiences.

"I learned to be funny starting way back in Jewish day school and Jewish summer camp. A big part of comedy is feeling like you don't fit in, but I've always been able to fit in well. My [Jewish] upbringing has helped ground me."

He's been doing standup professionally now for 11 years and said he feels one of his mandates as a Jewish comedian is to "make Judaism cool" for his Jewish audiences, especially younger Jews who may not think of their culture as a place where "cool" resides.

Chasnoff, 37, is fluent in Hebrew and said he tries to visit Israel at least once a year – his wife is Israeli and her family is all there – and while there he sometimes performs for Israeli crowds from time to time.

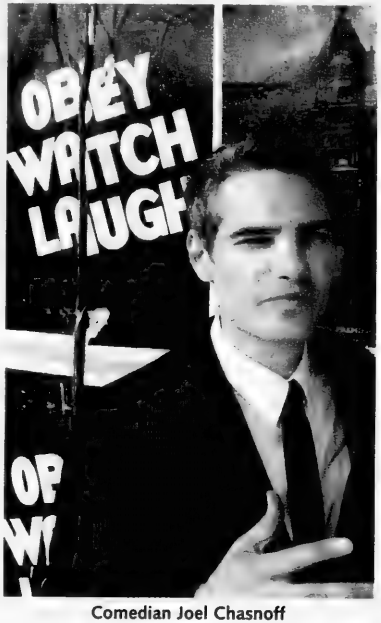
He once did a bit on an Israeli late-night talk show, though admits it was "tough" as Israeli crowds are "judgmental" if they hear a foreign accent in Hebrew.

Asked why he decided to voluntarily join the IDF at 24, Chasnoff explained that he was disillusioned after graduating from the University of Pennsylvania and initially failing in his comedy career.

"I always had this image of the Israeli soldier as this kick-ass Jew. That came from the movie Raid on Entebbe, which I saw when I was nine," he said. "I loved that there were Jews just like me, yet who were nothing like me. They had guns, wearing army uniforms... they were nothing like the Jews I grew up with [in America]. I fell in love with the idea of Jews who could stand up for themselves."

While he said he'd never experienced blatant antisemitism himself growing up, "I was very conscious of being different" because of being Jewish in America.

He said despite some of the foibles and hardships he experienced in the IDF, he still considers it his home army, over-and-above the U.S. Army.



Comedian Joel Chasnoff

"What I've always loved about Israel is that, as much as there's conflict, you can just be a Jew and breathe a little easier. I just feel comfortable there," he said.

Chasnoff is in the process of adapting his novel into a screenplay, though at the moment he's "not sure how that will work."

His advice to aspiring comedians: "It's simple. Your career will take care of itself if you can write a solid act. If you can get five to 10 minutes [of material] down efficiently, with original and surprising punch lines... and do it consistently for two or three years at open mikes in your city, everything else will follow. Agents and bookings will follow."

Leave the boys alone

Dear Ella,

It happened again last night. Jack and I have three couples we're close with. We all try to get together at least once a month, rotating turns and having dinner at each other's homes. This has been going on for years, ever since we finished university, which is where many of us met. Then we all got married and had busy lives, so we developed this ritual. It's a nice evening when we get away from our regular routines and enjoy each other's company.

We used to laugh over wine and dinner and discuss old times, but I've noticed over the last couple of years that after dinner, the men and women seem to separate into their own rooms and have their own conversations.

Ask Ella

Ella Burakowski

I went into the kitchen last night to get some water, and it was then that I realized that the women were all sitting around the dining room table discussing kids, recipes and American Idol while the men were on the deck in the backyard.

They go out with the intention of smoking cigars, which they're not allowed to do in any of our houses.

I went over to the patio door and listened in on their conversation.

The words "insulation," "contractor," "soffit" and "flat roof" sent me scurrying back to the ladies, but when I went home, it bothered me that we no longer have anything to say to each other in a group.

Is this a sign of the times, or are we just boring old folk?

Nothing in Common

Dear Nothing in Common

It's nice to get together with old friends, and I'm sure you enjoy catching up with your gal pals too. Don't read too much into this separation of the sexes. The group stays together throughout dinner, right? It's not until after dinner that you separate into your two groups.

Men and women are wired differently. This is a fact. The problem begins when you try to change that. Don't expect your husbands to care about any television show that does not have a score or heavy-duty action. As for the kids, they see and hear about them all week. Usually, the last thing they want to discuss is their kids when they're out with friends. It's their time to unwind, and if that means talking about construction, sports or the stock market, so be it. It's not for you to understand. It's for you to accept. Don't take these differences as personal attempts to frustrate you. It doesn't mean you have nothing in common.

The idea that one gender should think and feel like the other is absurd. You should look at them and smile, knowing that they're enjoying themselves as much as you ladies are. The fact they do it differently is exactly what attracts us to the opposite sex. How boring would life be if we all thought and functioned the same way?

Go back to the table and enjoy the conversation with the girls. Feel confident and happy knowing your man is having a good a time, even if it's without you.

Don't look for problems where they don't exist.

The psychological and social needs of Canadian cancer patients who have completed treatment are not being adequately addressed by the public health-care system, according to one of this country's highest profile survivors of the disease, Dr. Marla Shapiro, left.

A matter of speaking

It's the kind of discussion I try to avoid when I am doing my clinic – the patient or family starts complaining about their family doctor or another specialist.

I avoid such discussions as I am not in a position to judge what transpires between a patient and another doctor, and it does not generally achieve the goal of getting the best care possible. Of interest, though, is that when there is a complaint, it most often revolves around communication and the rapidity of the interaction and lack of time to "explain" things.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

I recently saw a patient who was accompanied by a daughter. The latter seemed very reasonable and well informed. As I reviewed the records that were sent to me, I noted that another geriatric assessment had been done and the conclusion was congruent with mine. When I enquired why my second "opinion" was being requested, the daughter said that like the arrangement in my office, her mother was first seen by a resident, as it, too, was a teaching centre, but when the consultant came in he spent five minutes and left without some very important questions and issues being addressed. The daughter was concerned and was left dissatisfied since the diagnosis was one of dementia, which has some very important implications for treatment as well as prognosis and future planning.

Many of the complaints made to the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario, the regulatory body of physicians, are about communication or lack thereof rather than the competency in medical decision-making. When such issues are brought to the attention of the physician about whom a complaint is being made, it is very common for the physician to be unaware that there was a problem in communication. When it is brought to the physicians' attention, most are sorry that the patient interpreted what transpired as a lack of caring and dedication, rather than a fault in the communication process or perhaps communication style or skill of the physician.

It was therefore of special interest that the opinion piece in the Feb. 27 edition of the New York Times featured an article by the renowned physician Abraham Verghese titled Treat the Patient, Not the CT Scan. In it, the special focus is on the pre-eminence that modern medicine has given to computer technologies that assist physicians in making proper diagnoses, something that is paramount in good medical practice. But Verghese argues that sometimes what we are losing with this technology is the human touch, the important component of medicine, which is reflected in the "laying on of hands."

Patients, especially older ones, and their families expect a lot from us as physicians. What they expect is in essence what we promised to deliver when we took on that special privilege of being a doctor. Even with the most sophisticated aspects of contemporary medicine, it is important to remember to examine our patients with our hands, eyes, ears, stethoscopes and tendon hammers and then to speak in a way that is readily understood, always leaving time for those necessary, clarifying questions.

It may take a number of visits to achieve all of these goals. This is part of the important ritual and art of medicine that is no less important than its science. When both aspects are addressed and combined, physicians can best achieve the goals of comprehensive and humane care-giving.

Canada protects Israel's interests at G8

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canada ensured that the G8 summit statement on renewed peace negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians did not mention the region's 1967 borders as a pre-condition to peace talks.

Reports out of the G8 summit in Deauville, France, last Friday said Prime Minister Stephen Harper had, despite their objections, forced his counterparts to soften the language of the statement because of his strong support of the Jewish state.

The G8 summit brings together the leaders of Canada, the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Japan and Russia.

In order for any statement to be issued, all eight must reach consensus on its language.

The final statement expressed "strong support for the vision of the Israeli-Palestinian peace outlined by [U.S.] President [Barack] Obama," without referring to the 1967 borders.

"The Canadians were really very adamant, even though Obama expressly referred to 1967 borders in his speech last week," a European diplomat told Reuters last Friday.

In a May 19 Middle East policy speech, Obama called for the 1967 lines with mutually agreed land swaps to be the basis for a future border between Israel and a Palestinian state. This formulation drew objections from Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who called the 1967 lines "indefensible" for Israel.

Speaking to reporters at the closing of the summit last week, Harper said he wanted any G8 statement on peace negotiations to be balanced. He added he wanted both Israelis and the Palestinians held accountable for concessions each side must make, and that the statement not just focus on what Israelis must do for peace.

Citing Obama's May address, Harper cautioned that other G8 leaders shouldn't "cherry-pick" parts of the president's speech, which itself was balanced.

Portus Head Jailed

TORONTO — Boaz Manor, head of a defunct $800-million Toronto hedge fund that defrauded thousands of investors, got four years in jail last week in a deal worked out by the Crown and his lawyers. Manor, 37, founded Portus Asset Management Inc. in 2003. It was shut down by regulators in 2005 amid allegations assets were invested improperly. Manor fled to Israel, but returned in 2007 to face charges. He pleaded guilty last fall to one count of laundering funds obtained through breach of trust and one count of disobeying a court order. Investors got back most of their money, but he hasn't returned $9 million in diamonds he says he doesn't have. In 2007, fund co-founder Michael Mendelson was jailed two years for fraud after a guilty plea.

The archives, a department of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, will get the Scadding Award of Excellence, given to organizations that make an outstanding contribution to the history field. The archives is one of 11 winners this year.

CJC Gets New CEO

TORONTO — Benjamin Shinewald was named acting CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress last week, replacing Bernie Farber, who is running for the Liberals in the riding of Thornhill in the Oct. 6 Ontario election. Shinewald had been Congress' national executive director and general counsel.

Agencies Help Jewish Tornado Victims

JOPLIN, Mo. — Two Jewish brothers who were reported missing in the wake of the deadly May 22 tornado in Joplin, Mo., are safe.

All the members of the small Jewish community in Joplin were accounted for last week, but many lost their homes and possessions in the tornado and were in need of basic supplies.

The Jewish Federation of St. Louis said at least four families lost everything and are living in shelters. The federation is collecting donations to help the victims, and the city's Jewish Community Relations Council was gathering supplies such as blankets, T-shirts, water, baby supplies and toiletries to drive into Joplin.

Some 50 Jews live in Joplin, according to the federation, amid a population of some 50,000.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Kansas City's board of directors voted May 24 to allocate $5,000 in emergency funds to the relief efforts in Joplin.

Rabbi Yehuda Weg, the Tulsa-based director of Chabad-Lubavitch of Oklahoma, told Chabad.org that several Jewish-owned homes were "totally flattened." He had driven to Joplin May 23 with a list of Jews in need and a car full of supplies. Rabbi Weg travels to Joplin twice a month to supervise kosher production at several food manufacturers and to meet with 15 to 20 Jews affiliated with Chabad living there.

The United Hebrew Congregation of Joplin, a Reform synagogue, reportedly wasn't damaged. It has existed in the city since at least 1919.

Another Brit Ban?

LOS ANGELES — An anti-circumcision group will circulate a petition in Santa Monica, Calif., to put a measure banning male circumcision on an upcoming ballot. A notice proposing a ballot initiative banning "genital cutting of male minors" for the November ballot in Santa Monica, was filed with the city. The filing comes on the heels of an identical one approved for the November ballot in San Francisco. It makes it a misdemeanour crime to circumcise a boy under 18. Maximum penalty is a year in jail and a $1,000 fine. Circumcisions would only be legal for medical reasons, with no religious exemptions.

Center facilitates medical aid for Palestinian kids

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Arie Raif is a Shimon Peres man – he's known and admired the Israeli president through much of Raif's diplomatic and business careers – so as the public face of the Peres Center for Peace in Canada, he's proud to quote the Nobel Prize winner.

When Peres was asked how he'd like to be remembered, the president replied, "'as someone who saved the life of one child, whether Israeli or Palestinian.'" Raif recounted.

"We will carry on in Canada a campaign to raise funds for the Save the Children program, where we... take across the border babies who are suffering and need treatment for cardiac surgeries, bone marrow transplants and cochlear [ear] implants," Raif said.

Currently, the Peres Center has the means to fund medical treatments for 350 Palestinian children annually, even though it has received requests from close to 3,000.

The Canadian Peres Center for Peace Foundation recently was granted charitable status, entitling it to issue tax-deductible receipts, Raif, the organization's vice-chair, said. He expects it to begin to ramp up its activities.

Founded in 1996 by Shimon Peres, the Peres Center's mission "is to build an infrastructure of peace and reconciliation by and for the people of the Middle East that promotes socio-economic development, while advancing cooperation and mutual understanding," according to its website.

The centre is also designed to implement Peres' vision of a Middle East in which people work peacefully in a spirit of co-operation.

In a statement from Israel recognizing the Canadian branch of the centre, Peres said: "Given the way of possible democratization in the Middle East, mutual peace will be between the people of the region and not only between the governments. The challenge of the people, especially the young, is to co-operate in favour of peaceful coexistence. This is the mission of the Peres Center for Peace."

Israeli President Shimon Peres speaks to some of the families who have benefited from medical services in Israel through the Peres Center for Peace.

Peace through co-operation

One day, the full story of Shimon Peres will be written. When it is, readers will have in their hands the story of a rare and exceptional man who helped steer Israel through all the dangerous shoals at the key moments of Israel's modern history and who never once avoided fighting hard and long for what he truly believed.

Of course, what Shimon Peres believed in was not – indeed, is not even today – necessarily shared by the proverbial man-on-the-street, whether that man or that street is in Tel Aviv, Ramallah or Damascus.

From the editor's desk...

And yet, throughout his life, against all odds, he has tirelessly persevered to the very end of the way for the sake of his beliefs. In this, he adopted the risk-laden, though self-assured approach of David Ben-Gurion, his mentor.

Today, in the twilight of a storied public career, the octogenarian probably enjoys wider acceptance among the diverse Israeli population, than at any prior moment in his embattled life in politics.

As president of the state, he is finally above the fractious, partisan fray of Israel's nasty, cut-to-the-bone, domestic politics – at least theoretically. He is one of the western world's acknowledged elder statesmen, experienced in war and peace, defence and diplomacy and highly respected in the palaces, parliaments and peoples' congresses in many parts of the globe.

Some 15 years ago, when he saw up-close, the weak points of the Oslo accords peace structure, he decided to found a centre for peace that would attempt over time, to repair those weaknesses.

Thus, in 1996, he founded the Center for Peace that bears his name. (Please see the related story in this edition of The CJN on page 3.) Its overall aim is to try to build a foundation for peace between Palestinians and Israelis from the ground up, to foster trust and mutual understanding between the two contending peoples by myriad programs requiring co-operation, collaboration and joint action among individuals. The idea is to weave so many lines of interconnections, relationships and goodwill over time between "ordinary" human beings, that the resulting social fabric between the two peoples and the two neighbouring states will be civil if not friendly, but always resilient.

Those interconnecting individual lines of personal contact will intertwine across a range of six specific categories of human activity: medical, agricultural, business, high technology, cultural and sports.

The busy, creative hub of all these activities – its headquarters, so to speak – is the Peres Peace House in Jaffa. The CJN visited the Peace House last month at the invitation of the newly established Canadian branch of the peace centre.

The architecture and location of the Peace House are intrinsic to the purposes of the centre. Every detail of the building is intended to reflect the centre's mission. Situating it in the mixed Arab-Jewish community of Jaffa was a very deliberate, public demonstration of bridge-building between the two communities.

The house sits on the southernmost edge of Jaffa in the relatively poor neighbourhood of Ajami, adjacent to a Muslim cemetery. Beyond the cemetery is the town of Bat Yam. The residents of Jaffa and, of course, of the Ajami neighbourhood, use the building for recreational, cultural and educational activities.

It is the stunningly stark design of renowned Italian architect Massimilia Fuksas. It looks like a large, four-storey, rectangular layer cake of grey-beige cement and glass.

The ubiquitous glass walls wrapping all four sides of the building between the concrete layering provides a view to the outside that is calming and inspiring for the staff of the centre – 80 per cent of whom are women. More importantly, however, as explained to me, the glass provides a view from the outside into the building, symbolizing the social, political and financial transparency by which the centre operates.

Peres Peace House

The grey-beige concrete layers blend with the sand of the shoreline and the hilly incline leading to the sea on which the Peace House sits. Its western wall is merely metres from the edge of the waters of the Mediterranean whose vast horizon casts the perfect backdrop for the limitless hope that Shimon Peres carries for the centre in the ceaseless, unyielding pulling of the sea to the shore and back again.

Next week, I will write about some of the centre's programs. – MBD

SCHALIT ACTIVISTS STALL FUNDS TRANSFER

Dozens of protesters near the Erez crossing recently blocked an armoured vehicle carrying $13 million (US) in funds from entering Gaza. They demanded that the Israeli government halt the transfer until IDF soldier Gilad Schalit is freed from his five-year captivity in Gaza. The funds are tax transfers that Israel collects for the Palestinian Authority and government in Gaza. [Israel Sun]

City executive committee accepts Pride report

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The City of Toronto's executive committee has accepted the city manager's report that the words "Israeli apartheid" do not contravene the city's anti-discrimination policy.

At a heated debate last Tuesday, councillors and community members discussed the report – issued in April by city manager Joe Pennachetti – before the committee finally reached its unanimous decision to adopt the report's recommendations. It will now go before the full city council on June 14.

Len Rudner

Pennachetti was asked by council last year to review whether Pride Toronto was in contravention of the city's non-discrimination policy because it allowed the group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) to participate in the annual Pride parade for the past three years.

In his April recommendation to council, Pennachetti concluded that the term "Israeli apartheid" is not a hateful phrase. He based his decision on the fact the term has never been found in violation of the Ontario Human Rights Code or the Criminal Code of Canada.

Len Rudner, Ontario regional director of Canadian Jewish Congress, spoke to the executive committee about the Jewish community's position on the report.

Speaking on behalf of Congress , UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Council of Israel and Jewish Advocacy, Rudner said Pennachetti's report was based on flawed logic and was "too narrow" in its scope of interpretation.

He said while Congress "respects the research" the city manager and his team put into the report, there was ample room for more analysis.

"There is, for example, no law in Canada that says a person can't be an antisemite or a homophobe," Rudner said. "The city manager should have also considered the values which animate the City of Toronto."

Additionally, Rudner outlined how the term "Israeli apartheid" is "both hateful in its expression and antisemitic in its implications." He explained how QuAIA and similar groups use the juxtaposition of the two words to brand Israel as a racist state, and by extension accuse its supporters – which includes most Jews – of being racist and of perpetrating "alleged crimes against humanity."

"This characterization may not find traction in the Ontario Human Rights Code or the Criminal Code of Canada, but it should give pause to the city executive committee."

While the committee's agenda item was ostensibly to decide on whether to adopt the report, debate also strayed to the still-contentious issue of city funding for Pride.

On that matter, the city has adopted a resolution, put forward last year by Ward 7 Councillor Giorgio Mammoliti, to withhold funding from Pride until after this year's parade to ensure the event organizers prevent QuAIA from participating again.

Earlier this year, the controversial group announced it would not participate in this year's parade and would host its own event outside of Pride 2011.

Both the city and Pride Toronto are taking QuAIA at its word that it won't register for or try to crash the parade.

Toronto funds Pride with a cultural grant worth nearly $128,000 and provides more than $250,000 worth of in-kind services, such as security and garbage removal, for the festival.

Mammoliti had initially called for Pride to give a written guarantee that QuAIA would not be allowed in the parade. Pride would not commit to that, insisting instead that its newly instituted dispute resolution process would receive complaints about QuAIA if it applied to take part this year.

After last week's committee meeting, Mammoliti told the gay and lesbian newspaper Xtra! that he and others on council are still wary of QuAIA's activities at Pride this year.

"QuAIA better stay away," he said. "If they think they can do what they want at the expense of the taxpayer, they're wrong. The City of Toronto isn't going to fund an organization that wants to cause trouble. This councillor will defend the Jewish community, and I'll do it in an aggressive way."

In an effort to further placate council, Pride representatives assured the committee that the organization would throw out any members of QuAIA who tried to participate in this year's parade.

Martin Gladstone, the lawyer and gay rights activist who helped shed light on QuAIA's activities in the parade, said that overall he was "OK" with council's decisions last week.

"I am glad Pride got the funding. I am glad QuAIA is out. I am glad [QuAIA members] will be removed if they crash and that the money gets paid after the event to keep it honest," he said, adding however, that he was "not pleased" by the adoption of Pennachetti's report.

Justine Apple, executive director of Kulanu Toronto, the city's main Jewish gay and lesbian advocacy organization, said her organization supported the city's decision not to fund Pride until after the parade.

Walk With Israel raises nearly $500,000

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto knows what it takes to bring out thousands of Torontonians for a long walk on a rainy afternoon: the chance to show support for Israel, and camel rides at Ontario Place.

On Sunday, May 29, more than 12,000 men, women, and children braved the weather and headed to Coronation Park for United Jewish Appeal's annual Walk With Israel. The walk, culminating in a festival at Ontario Place, raised nearly $500,000 for UJA's charitable projects in Israel.

UJA's Walk With Israel is Toronto's largest single Jewish community event and one of the biggest Israeli solidarity events in the world.

The 44th annual Walk With Israel kicked off at Coronation Park with an inflatable playground and a performance by Juno Award-winner Shawn Desman. After the concert, participants walked eight kilometres along the downtown core and waterfront.

"Every year, more people join the walk to celebrate Israel's achievements and to raise funds for Israeli communities," said Howard English, vice-president of corporate communications at federation. "It really shows the remarkable affinity for Israel among members of the Jewish community and friends."

UJA officials also attributed the walk's fundraising success to the new "Family Challenge" program, which encouraged families to compete together as fundraising units. The winning family raised a staggering $34,113.

The walk featured five venues, each named after Israeli communities that would benefit from the event's proceeds. Maple Leaf Square became "Bat Yam," where UJA will help integrate Ethiopian Israelis through educational initiatives; HTO Park was dubbed "Sderot." Other funds went to support communities in Eilat, Acco, Hatzor Haglilit, Metulla and Jerusalem.

After the walk, participants were invited to the Renee and Irwin Nadal Festival at Ontario Place, where participants enjoyed a kosher barbecue, live entertainment and the camel rides. Young adults were invited to an alternative after-party in nearby Liberty Village, hosted by UJA and Jewish youth groups such as Hillel Toronto and Alpha Epsilon Pi. "We wanted to attract our demographic to the walk, so that we could get together and reconnect with our cultural values," said co-organizer Jordan Minuk.

"Just seeing so many people come out with pride to show support for Israel made me feel really proud," said participant Oren Weinstock.

Denise Alexander of Kulanu Toronto stressed that "as a female, gay Jewish woman, there are many reasons to come on the walk and celebrate Israel: Because I'm Jewish. Because Israel had a female prime minister. Because Israel supports the LGBT [lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender] community and we support them, too."

Roughly 200 volunteers participated in the event alongside 21 elected officials, including members of Parliament, members of the Ontario Legislature and municipal politicians.

Toronto teen co-chairs human rights summit

Jesse Freedman says he and fellow Jewish teens have a responsibility to prevent atrocities from happening again.

A Grade 11 student at Crestwood College in Toronto, Freedman, 16, recently participated in the March of the Living, the annual Holocaust educational program that takes place in Poland and Israel.

"The trip was powerful, but we can't let the trip just end," he told The CJN.

Freedman, who is finishing a one-year term as regional president of B'nai Brith Youth Organization's (BBYO) Lake Ontario region, wants more students to know about the upcoming Human Rights and Genocide Summit, a pilot project of the PANIM Institute of BBYO, which he is co-chairing with Laurel Cohen, who lives in Orlando, Fla.

The summit will be held at the Crowne Plaza hotel in Silver Spring, Md., just outside Washington, D.C., from June 26 to 28. It's geared toward March of the Living participants, but open to all Jewish teens in grades 10, 11 or 12.

Applications are being accepted until June 3, and about half of those registered so far are March alumni. The cost of the summit is $250 (US), or $150 (US) for alumni. Bus transportation for Toronto alumni is $210.

The summit will include sessions on how to lobby, and speakers from organizations including Free the Slaves, the Genocide Intervention Network, and the Committee on Conscience, which is part of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. Summit participants will visit the museum, which has an exhibit on preventing genocide.

As well, students will see the movie, The Wrong Side of the Bus, about the difference between being a bystander and being an "upstander." The documentary traces the journey of a South African-born child of Holocaust survivors and his son back to Cape Town, and the father's coming to terms with apartheid and his lack of action as a young man.

American teens will have meetings at U.S. congressional offices, while their Canadian counterparts will head to the Canadian Embassy.

Mikah Goldman, program manager of PANIM, expects between 50 and 70 students to participate in the pilot project. "I'm hoping that teens will really feel empowered," she said.

Freedman said the trip made him feel that taking action to prevent injustices is "necessary," not just important.

"I feel I've been blessed by being born in a free country. I have the ability to give back to the community that's given me so much.

"I feel like, as Canadians and Jews, we represent the two largest peacekeeping forces in the entire world," he said. "Canadians are known worldwide for peacekeeping, and attempts to stop genocides and protect human rights. And as Jews, the commandment of tikkun olam, repairing the world, is written into our holy texts."

Judith Finer-Freedman, Jesse's mother and vice-chair of BBYO's international board of directors, said she hopes the Canadian March of the Living has "a presence" at the summit.

Alana Getzler, Toronto March director, said that although there is post-March programming here, the summit offers a different model and is "a great opportunity for kids to put the lessons of the March into action."

Toronto March of the Living alumni who wish to register for the summit should contact Getzler at agetzler@ujafed.org to register and arrange bus transportation from Toronto.

In Montreal, March alumni who wish to register should contact Mandy Gillman at mandy.gillman@bjec.org.

For more information about the summit, or for non-alumni of Canadian March of the Living who want to register, go to http://panim.bbyo.org/genocidesummit2011.

For Jerusalem

In the more than 3,000 years of its long, storied history, Jerusalem was a politically divided place for only the briefest period of time – 19 years, from 1948-1967. When the British ruling authority left Mandatory Palestine in mid-May, 1948, the Jordanian Legion seized the eastern sector of Jerusalem, including of course, the Old City, dividing the historic city for the very first time ever.

Why is it not, therefore, viewed by most people as an affront to history let alone to truth and fairness that the Palestinians wish to politically divide the city once again?

After the armistice went into effect, bringing to a halt the war launched by five armies of the Arab League against the nascent Jewish state, the Jews were expelled from the Old City. To that point, Jews had always lived in the walled Old City of Jerusalem. We might also add that the Jews' homes were destroyed, as were all the synagogues and other distinctively Jewish markers in the Old City.

By destroying the sheer physical Jewish presence in the Old City, the Jordanians thought they would thereby also destroy what to that point had been known for millennia by humankind throughout the world: the eternal Jewish connection to Jerusalem. But the Jordanians – and the entire Arab world along with them – were wrong.

Nineteen years after the start of Israel's War of Independence, and 18 years after the armistice, the army of the Jewish state recaptured what it had lost in 1948 and reunified what the Jordanians had divided: beloved Jerusalem. Indeed it was this week, 44 years ago, on the 28th day of Iyar, (June 1 this year) that Motta Gur, the commander of the paratroop forces that recaptured east Jerusalem, famously said: "Har Habayit b'yadeinu." ("The Temple Mount is in our hands.")

By what standard of fairness or propriety do peoples and states demand of Israel now that it must redivide the city and relinquish from those very same hands the city's eastern part?

The subject of Jerusalem came up in Washington last week. In plain, bold language, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told the joint houses of the U.S. Congress that "Jerusalem must never again be divided. Jerusalem must remain the united capital of Israel."

A single political sovereignty for the city of Jerusalem does not preclude meaningful, full, open, rewarding, civic involvement and participation by its Arab residents. Netanyahu himself said as much to the American lawmakers: "I know this is a difficult issue for Palestinians. But I believe that, with creativity and with goodwill, a solution can be found."

A divided Jerusalem was never the historic or municipal norm. The 19 years of division under the Jordanians was an aberration. For the sake of the city and the people who live there, we must not make that aberration the norm.

Israel's Health Ministry said it had given permission to Hadassah Medical Center to perform heart transplants and expected the hospital to perform about 12 a year. The procedure had been banned previously because of unresolved halachic issues raised by the chief rabbinate on the question of time of death. Hadassah officials said the issue would be discussed further with the two chief rabbis.

Obama's speech (1)

U.S. President Barack Obama is not going back far enough calling for a Palestinian state based on 1967 borders ("Digesting Obama's speech," May 26). Why not borders based on the San Remo Conference of 1920, where the geographic region known as "Palestine" acquired a legal identity? Later, in 1922, the League of Nations determined the area between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea be Jewish Palestine and the area east of the Jordan River be Arab Palestine

Thus the problem of bringing another Palestinian state into existence would not be necessary, as it already exists in the name of Jordan. For those who are not happy to live in areas west of the Jordan River in Jewish Palestine (i.e. Israel), they could be financially compensated for the inconvenience of moving to Arab Palestine, which would be more than the Arab states did when they forced out their Jewish citizens with nothing after attacking the State of Israel in 1948.

Obama's speech (2)

On the Arab-Israeli conflict, the "pre-1967 borders" are not the basis for a peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinians. The basis must be the Palestinian acceptance of Israel as a Jewish state and an end to terrorism as a negotiating tool. Then, peace talks hold the prospect of a speedy resolution, and the Palestinians will have the state denied them by the Egyptian and Jordanian occupation of 1948 to 1967.

Obama's speech (3)

JSpaceCanada, the voice of progressive Zionism in Canada, applauds U.S. President Barack Obama's statement that talks between Israel and the Palestinians should begin with the pre-1967 borders and adjusted through negotiated land swaps. This is one of the crucial foundational building blocks for long-term peace and security. We are disappointed that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu did not appear to offer anything new by way of substance for his vision of peace with the Palestinians. Instead, the prime minister in his Washington speeches appeared to show no flexibility or movement on any of the major obstacles to a peace agreement, including the issue of borders and the future of east Jerusalem. It is urgent that both Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas demonstrate leadership by coming forward with constructive suggestions and returning to negotiations that will lead to a peaceful and lasting solution.

Netanyahu speaks to U.S. Congress

Uriel Heilman
JTA

Any peace deal with the Palestinians must grant Israel a military presence along the Jordan River, exclude repatriation of Palestinian refugees to Israel and leave Jerusalem as Israel's united capital, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week.

However,he said Tuesday in his address to a joint meeting of the U.S. Congress, some Jewish settlements in the West Bank would fall outside Israel's borders in a final peace deal.

Netanyahu did not appear to offer anything new by way of substance for his vision of peace with the Palestinians. He said Israel "would be very generous" about the size of the Palestinian state, but he provided few details.

"Israel needs unique security arrangements because of its unique size," Netanyahu said.

On the dispute over Jerusalem, which he vowed would remain Israel's undivided capital city, he said that "with creativity and with good will, a solution can be found."

On the issue of Palestinian refugees, Netanyahu said Palestinians could not be allowed to immigrate to Israel.

"Palestinians from around the world should have the right to immigrate, if they so choose, to the Palestinian state," he said. "The Palestinian refugee problem will be resolved outside the borders of Israel."

On borders and security, Netanyahu reiterated his call for a presence on the western shore of the Jordan River, which demarcates the boundary between the West Bank and Jordan.

"It's absolutely vital that a Palestinian state be demilitarized," Netanyahu said, "and it's absolutely vital that Israel maintain a long-term military presence along the Jordan River."

In speeches late last month, U.S. President Barack Obama also called for a "non-militarized" Palestinian state. But Obama said the issue of Palestinian refugees and Jerusalem's status should be left for future negotiations, and that the Palestinian state should have a border with Jordan – a stance that appears to contradict Netanyahu's.

Netanyahu received a warm reception from Congress, including more than two dozen standing ovations, and made a forceful case highlighting the commonalities between Israel and America and explaining Israel's security challenges. He talked about the threat of Iran's nuclear program and said the Palestinian Authority must end its agreement with Hamas, which he called "the Palestinian version of Al Qaeda."

The Israeli prime minister had an informal delivery, cracking several jokes and twice turning around to address U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden. When a heckler interrupted Netanyahu at one point, Congress tried to drown her out with a standing ovation, much as the pro-Israel crowd at the annual banquet of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) did the previous evening.

"This is real democracy," Netanyahu said after the heckler had been removed from the chamber of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Netanyahu repeated some lines from the night before, when most of Congress joined the crowd at the AIPAC gala.

"Israel is not what is wrong about the Middle East," he said both days. "Israel is what is right about the Middle East."

On the Palestinian issue, Netanyahu said, "I'm willing to make painful compromises to achieve this historic peace." He called the West Bank the Palestinians' homeland, but rejected the notion that it belongs to them alone.

"In Judea and Samaria, the Jewish people are not foreign occupiers," Netanyahu said, referring to the West Bank. "This is the land of our forefathers, the land of Israel to which Abraham brought the idea of one God."

He laid the blame for the failure of the peace process on the Palestinians' refusal to accept a Jewish state.

"Our conflict has never been about the establishment of a Palestinian state," Netanyahu said. "It's always been about the existence of a Jewish state. That's what this conflict is about."

He said the Palestinians continue to incite against Israelis.

"I stood before my people and said I will accept a Palestinian state," Netanyahu said. "It's time for [Palestinian] President [Mahmoud] Abbas to stand before his people and say, 'I will accept a Jewish state.'"

As for the contours of a future Palestinian state, Netanyahu indicated that large settlement blocs would become part of Israel, along with "other areas of critical strategic and national importance," but that "in any real peace agreement, in any peace agreement that ends the conflict, some settlements will end up beyond Israel's borders."

He said, "We recognize that a Palestinian state must be big enough to be viable, to be independent, to be prosperous."

The Israeli prime minister cited Obama's declaration that the borders will not return to those of June 4, 1967, repeating his own reaction to Obama's May 19 speech: "Israel will not return to the indefensible boundaries of 1967."

Much of the speech was devoted to trying to shift the focus back onto Iran's march toward a nuclear weapon.

"They could put a bomb anywhere. They could put it in a missile," Netanyahu said. "They could eventually put it in a suitcase or on a subway."

Netanyahu praised Obama for shepherding sanctions against Iran through the U.N. Security Council and saluted America for not staying silent in the face of calls from Tehran for Israel's destruction.

"The more Iran believes all options are on the table, the less the chance of confrontation," Netanyahu added.

Obama urges Palestinians to reject unilateralism

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — U.S. President Barack Obama said last Wednesday that the Palestinians should negotiate with the Israelis and not appeal to the United Nations for statehood.

"I strongly believe that for Palestinians to take the United Nations route rather than the path of sitting down and talking with the Israelis is a mistake," Obama said in a joint press conference with British Prime Minister David Cameron in London.

"The United Nations can achieve a lot of important work. What it is not going to be able to do is deliver a Palestinian state," he said. "The only way to see a Palestinian state is if Palestinians and Israelis agree on a just peace."

Obama also reassured that he was confident a two-state solution for Israel and the Palestinians was achievable.

"My goal, as I set out in a speech I gave..., is a Jewish State of Israel that is safe and secure and recognized by its neighbours, and a sovereign state of Palestine in which the Palestinian people are able to determine their own fate and their own future," Obama said. "I am confident that can be achieved."

In related developments, French President Nicolas Sarkozy said at a news conference at the G8 meeting in northern France last Thursday that France believes a Palestinian unity deal "is good news" for the Middle East peace process and that France will do everything it can to revive Palestinian-Israeli negotiations. The Fatah movement of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and its Islamist rival, Hamas, have agreed to set up a new government.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said on Wednesday that Israel was offering "nothing we can build on" for peace, and that without progress, he would seek UN recognition of Palestinian statehood in September.

Sarkozy said the peace process had to be revived, as the status quo could not continue.

French Foreign Minister Alain Juppé was to travel to the Middle East this week for talks, in the hope of convincing both sides to come back to the negotiating table and push for a peace and donors conference in France this summer.

"[Alain Juppé] will deliver a message from me to tell the Palestinians and Israelis that peace has waited too long and that it is at hand," Sarkozy said.

Meanwhile, in London, Middle East envoy Tony Blair told an audience of business leaders that Obama launched his peace initiative because he's concerned about what might happen to Israel if Palestinians unilaterally declare statehood.

Blair said Obama is "frankly worried about the position that Israel is in."

The former prime minister said Obama's initiative, which he outlined last week in a Middle East policy speech, is an "an attempt to fill a vacuum which he sees as dangerous, particularly dangerous for Israel in the run-up to September."

Mideast watchers have speculated that Washington launched its peace initiative to head off a potentially damaging vote on Palestinian statehood at the United Nations General Assembly in September.

Palestinians have been open in declaring their intention to take the issue to the UN, and the effects of their diplomatic campaign have led to several countries announcing that they will recognize an independent Palestinian state.

In his speech, Obama said a future Palestinian state must be based in territories captured by Israel in the 1967 Mideast war, with minor adjustments reached through negotiations.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu rejected the idea of 1967 borders, calling them "indefensible."

The wholeness that follows the brokenness

Shavuot marks the end of an era: the end of the era of Israelite slavery and the culmination of the first phase of their liberty. The period of the Omer takes them from Passover – liberation – to covenant in the event at Sinai.

Rabbi Irving Greenberg describes Shavuot as "Sinai: the Reenactment" and remarks: "Earlier rabbinic midrash interprets the weeks between Passover and Shavuot as a passage period from slavery to freedom. The Israelites came out of Egypt saturated with Egyptian values; the 49 days enabled them to 'remove' the impurities of Egypt and to uncover some primordial Jewish identity and memory."

Yet the actual biblical story is more ironic: as Moses is up on the mountain receiving the 10 luminous words plus a long list of dos and don'ts, the Israelites are down on the ground whooping it up around a golden calf, with Aaron standing by, no doubt wringing his hands.

Yes, even the terror and awe of the mountain with its thunder and mysterious blasts of trumpets doesn't seem to have been enough to bolster the Israelites' nerve. They still needed a tangible representation of their God, just as the Egyptians and every other people around them did. So the Golden Calf, modelled on the bulls set up in temples across the ancient Near East, was what they needed. It should have come as no surprise. Slavery as a mindset is not so easily overcome.

Moses, coming down from the mountain after his 40-day absence, in anger breaks the tablets he is bringing to the people.

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

Broken seem to be the operative word.

Let me digress a moment.

The short novel Broken For You, by Stephanie Kallos, is a story of people whose lives have been broken: a survivor whose new life in America is still fractured by her experiences in the Holocaust; a daughter and father mending the brokenness of their lengthy separation; another woman whose father's priceless china collection hides a secret. Each one, over the course of the novel, tries not to mend the broken parts to recreate the past but to reuse the pieces of broken hearts and china to create new realities.

The generation of slaves, coming into the desert and facing the exploding mountain, were also broken people. They tried first to mend that broken state by forging a visible god of gold who would help them mend. It didn't work.

Moses, meanwhile, was receiving the fragile pieces of a law that would eventually blossom into a sturdy way of life for a new generation, but the first attempt failed when he shattered the tablets on the rocky hillside.

It seems that brokenness must precede a new wholeness.

In many ways Shavuot, rather than Yom Kippur, gives us a solemn way of moving past what has shattered in our lives, about achieving a new level of consciousness. By re-enacting the events at Sinai during Shavuot, we also have to confront the fact that the first attempts ended in failure.

On the other hand, a Sephardi custom described by Rabbi Greenberg has a kabbalistic origin: the wedding between Israel and God, portraying the holiday as wholly joyous. A simulated wedding contract is read (Rabbi Greenberg quotes one written in 1688), and sometimes rose petals and other flowers were thrown as the ceremony proceeded.

So should Shavuot be a holiday of unmitigated joy and ceremony? Or is it a day when we should remember that brokenness should precede a new wholeness of spirit? Let's face it: it remains a holiday often overlooked or noted only because we recite Yizkor on the (Diaspora) second day.

I find an answer in the Book of Ruth. Here was a family broken by famine, exile, and death. Only two survivors make it back to Israel, Naomi and daughter-in-law Ruth. Both women are broken by the tragedies that overtook them, Naomi losing both husband and sons, Ruth, a husband and the chance to have a child. Ruth also loses a homeland, following her mother-in-law into a foreign country.

Yet out of their broken state comes, first, their survival in an old-new land, then the chance for a new beginning. The past cannot be restored to them. But Ruth and Naomi now share a child whose birth will lead to a future king for Israel.

The importance of ritual and ceremony

Recently, we were all invited to the wedding of the royals, Prince William and his bride, Catherine. Many of us found ways to share in this celebration. Female members of my own family woke up at 5 a.m. for a "pyjama and hat" wedding party. All over the world, people gathered to participate somehow in this spectacle. Why?

In the following days, there were comments on the procedures, the media blitz, the clothes, the meanings and the waste. Some people praised the event. Others complained. I was enthralled and hopeful. For the entire world to join in a moment of pure joy, of private love and public loyalty is surely a positive experience of nation building. It was a moment of unity, and that's a good thing. It also sold many newspapers and TV ads – not a bad thing in a slow economy. Just think of the trickle-down effect!

The world had just been preoccupied with scenes of bloody revolution from North Africa and the Middle East. These, too, were important moments, but they were full of death and the results were still ambiguous. But the marriage in London was a different event: pomp and circumstance, yes but not necessarily wasteful. The "royals" – who represent the nation politically and Britain diplomatically all over the world in many significant ways – let us into their lives. These are important moments that unite a nation positively.

Ceremonies that are shared across borders are the building blocks of future understanding and co-operation. They build roads to peace and friendship. "I was at your wedding. I know you. Maybe we can talk." Events such as this also enable members to feel part of one nation. "Yes, we're different. Sure, I can't afford that wedding for my daughter, but I can see that my prince has such a wedding. I can hold my head high that my nation has good standards and world-wide admirers."

All these are important elements and benefits of the ceremony.

Additionally, it was a good news day. Instead of complaining that all we read about in the newspaper is death, torture and more taxes, with this event, we got pages of good news, and even some questionable fashion.

But the larger point I wish to make is to remind us that ceremony is important.

In Spain, there has been a reduction in church attendance and ritual – similar to Quebec. As a result of the rejection of church control, it seems there are fewer marriages. But it also seems the people are opting for civil rituals. The telling data indicates that while many have stopped having church baptisms, they now have initiated something called "civil baptism," a ritual to mark the welcoming of the child into the community.

Think about it: parents want to welcome their baby into their lives and the life of their community, they just don't want the church involved. The ceremony wasn't objectionable, only the auspices of the institution. Of course, the enigma of calling it a baptism recalls religious meaning and issues of sanctity and theology, but that's just my point. Beliefs aren't totally discarded. They're reconstituted and restructured within a new framework.

Rituals help us mark important moments in our lives. They establish importance and meaning within a communal framework. They have lasting importance, because they provide a link to other members in the family and to past generations. Rituals and public ceremonies provide individuals and communities with memories that feed and create identities. Without these markers, our daily, weekly and yearly cycles would, frankly, be boring. More importantly, we would find ourselves rootless, without a defined and celebrated past.

A Jewish wedding is legally valid with just the bride, groom and two witnesses. Yet the rabbis understood the impact of community in cementing relationships and providing context for a new unit. Thus, they strongly recommended that a "minyan" – 10 men – be present. (Today, many of us would conclude that the community is represented by 10 adults.) Significantly, the community has a stake in the success of this union. Its symbolic presence at their inception is an influential point of celebration, encouragement and support.

Weddings are good things. So are the celebrations of bar and bat mitzvahs. Encourage restraint in the spending department, but don't disparage the idea of celebration. We need these rituals. They're the cement of our cultural life.

Clashing visions in Washington and Jerusalem

If a picture tells a thousand words, cutting through political spin and exposing unvarnished truths, then the widely published photograph of U.S. President Barack Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu staring at each other stonily in the Oval Office of the White House late last month was certainly revealing.

Obama, having been influenced by recent revolutions and rebellions in the Arab world, had just endorsed a resolution of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians on the basis of Israel's pre-1967 lines and mutual land swaps, thereby becoming the first American president to set out this position in public. He said, "Our ultimate goal has to be a secure Israel, a Jewish state, living side by side with a contiguous, functioning and effective Palestinian state."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

To Israel's distress, and in a sign of its deepening isolation, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia backed Obama's path-breaking guidelines.

None too pleased by his ringing endorsement of a two-state solution based on this territorial formula, Netanyahu testily dismissed Obama's idea, calling the pre-Six Day War lines "indefensible" and saying he would never accept such boundaries.

In the annals of Israel's relationship with the United States, this was an acutely uneasy and defining moment, signifying a serious clash of visions between two close allies in what till now has been a fruitless and frustrating search for peace. But on closer examination, their differences were not as deep or as sharp as Obama's forthright speech might have indicated.

Two days after outlining his plan, a rebuke to the status quo and a rejection of Israel's occupation of the West Bank, Obama clarified his position, explaining that the parties themselves would negotiate "a border that is different than the one that existed on June 4, 1967" and declaring that an agreement would have to account for "the changes that have taken place over the last 44 years."

To Netanyahu – whose overarching objective in visiting the United States was to shift the burden of restarting the peace process from Israel to the Palestinian Authority – Obama's elaboration came as a source of relief, since it was remarkably similar to a commitment made by his predecessor, George. W. Bush. In 2004, Bush, one of the most pro-Israel of presidents, sent Ariel Sharon, then Israel's prime minister, a letter that was nothing less than music to his ears. Taking note of the demographic changes that have occurred since tens of thousands of Israeli settlers have moved to the West Bank, Bush stated it was "unrealistic to expect that the outcome of final status negotiations will be a full and complete return to the armistice lines of 1949."

If Obama's acceptance of the new realities in the West Bank was balm to Netanyahu, the less publicized points in his speeches may have satisfied him as well.

Reiterating the United States' longstanding friendship and bonds with Israel, Obama said its dedication to Israel's security is "unshakable" and "ironclad."

Obama not only called for a "non-militarized" Palestinian state, but warned that "profound and legitimate questions" were raised by the recent unity agreement between Fatah, which recognizes Israel, and Hamas, which seeks its destruction. Last week, the Obama administration released a statement saying it would not regard Hamas as a partner for peace unless it amends its policy.

In a stark warning to the Palestinian Authority, headed by President Mahmoud Abbas, Obama said its campaign to seek official recognition of statehood from the United Nations General Assembly in September would not be constructive.

Last week, he reiterated that Palestinian statehood should be the outcome of direct talks with Israel. As he put it, "I strongly believe that for the Palestinians to take the United Nations route rather than the path of sitting down and talking with the Israelis is a mistake."

Abbas has said he prefers to achieve statehood through mutual agreement with Israel rather than through the UN. But he doubts whether this is possible in light of Netanyahu's views. Before arriving in the United States for his seventh meeting with Obama in two years, Netanyahu spelled out his preconditions. He will not sign a peace accord with the Palestinians unless they do the following: recognize Israel as a Jewish state, promise to end the conflict, agree to solve the Palestinian refugee problem within the borders of a Palestinian state, and acquiesce to a demilitarized state and an Israeli army presence in the Jordan Valley.

Apart from these demands, Netanyahu wants to keep large settlement blocs – Gush Etzion, Maaleh Adumim and Ariel – and insists that Jerusalem should remain undivided as Israel's capital. And he will not negotiate unless the Palestinians revoke their reconciliation pact with Hamas, a group he has described as "a Palestinian version of Al Qaeda." Finally, Netanyahu has rejected the notion that substantive talks should resume at the point they ended in 2008, when Ehud Olmert was prime minister and a peace agreement seemed possible.

Without being specific, Netanyahu claims he is prepared to "cede parts of our homeland" and make "a far-reaching compromise" in exchange for true peace. To Likud party stalwarts such as Danny Danon, a deputy speaker of the Knesset who believes Israel should annex Israeli settlements in the West Bank, Netanyahu's apparent willingness to surrender land under the right conditions is an intolerable retreat from Likud doctrine.

The leadership of the Palestinian Authority is less than impressed by Netanyahu's proposals, having rejected them as unacceptable. The Palestinians have already laid down markers from which they claim they will not deviate. They will not resume talks – broken off last September after a series of ceremonial photo ops – unless Israel agrees to a settlement freeze in the West Bank and greater Jerusalem and to a withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines.

Israel's position on a settlement moratorium is crystal clear. Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman, a settler whose views are in sync with Netanyahu's, said recently, "There will be no building freeze in Jerusalem or in [the West Bank], not for three months, not for three days and not even for three hours."

Judging by Netanyahu's comments in Washington, D.C., it is safe to say that the current Israeli government will not return to the old armistice lines. Although Abbas has accepted the principle of land swaps, Netanyahu has yet to endorse the concept publicly.

Given their perception of Netanyahu, the Palestinians are pessimistic that peace talks can be renewed. Saeb Erekat, the chief Palestinian negotiator who has said that Israel must choose between peace and settlements, has concluded that the Palestinians have no Israeli partner at present. Abbas is thus likely to push ahead with plans to seek United Nations recognition of Palestinian statehood.

The mood in the Middle East was already grim. The U.S. special envoy to the Mideast, George Mitchell, resigned after two years of trying to coax Israel and the Palestinians into meaningful negotiations. And some Palestinians, weary of diplomacy, are itching for a third armed uprising.

The clock is ticking.

U.S.-Israel ties face new tensions, says ex-envoy

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Stark U.S. differences with Israel over the pre-1967 armistice lines as a baseline for restarting peace talks with the Palestinians have inflamed Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's already problematic relationship with President Barack Obama, the United States' former ambassador to Israel suggested in a speech last week.

Speaking to a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto event at the Ritz Carlton Hotel, Daniel Kurtzer said the leaders' relations are "encrusted with distrust," particularly after Netanyahu's recent visit to Washington, D.C.

Kurtzer, the American envoy in Tel Aviv from 2001 to 2005, explained that Obama's reference to the pre-Six Day War border was designed to reignite stalled peace talks and provide an outline of what the boundaries of a future Palestinian state might be after mutual land swaps. But at a White House photo-op, Netanyahu characterized the former armistice lines as "indefensible."

What's not understood is why Obama's formula evoked so much anger in Israel, said Kurtzer, who currently holds the S. Daniel Abraham Chair in Middle East Policy Studies at Princeton University's Woodrow School of Public and International Affairs.

Claiming that Netanyahu treated Obama "rather poorly" in reacting testily to his proposal, he accused the Israeli premier of accentuating their policy differences when there is so much agreement between the two allies on basic Mideast issues.

Kurtzer made these comments several days after Israeli opposition leader Tzipi Livni criticized Netanyahu for "harming" Israel's relationship with the United States. As she put it, "An American president [who] supports the two-state vision is representing Israeli interests and is not anti-Israel."

Calling current U.S.-Israeli tensions an "unnecessary fight," Kurtzer reminded the audience that Israel's close bonds with the United States are periodically strained and tested by disagreements.

Daniel Kurtzer

Citing an example from his tenure as ambassador, he recalled the time when Ariel Sharon, then Israeli prime minister, drew an "intemperate comparison" between U.S. leadership and Britain's pre-World War II appeasement-prone prime minister, Neville Chamberlain.

Sharon's analogy briefly threw U.S.-Israeli relations into a crisis mode, but he and Kurtzer were able to "talk through" the issue.

"Dialogue, communication and diplomacy worked," said Kurtzer, who was U.S. envoy to Egypt from 1997 to 2001.

Drawing conclusions from this unpleasant episode, Kurtzer urged the United States and Israel to find a way "to listen to each other" so as to restore basic trust in what is a strategic relationship. In this spirit, the United States and Israel should "learn anew" how to talk to each other so that problems are resolved rather than exacerbated.

In general, Israel's relations with the United States should be insulated from "the vicissitudes of everyday politics," he observed. But striking an upbeat tone, he said, "There's always a tomorrow."

For the Jewish state, the United States is not only a loyal friend, like Canada, but the provider of a "safety net" when Israel takes risks for peace.

In a plea for greater co-ordination and understanding, he said, "It's important for our two countries to solve problems together."

Kurtzer said he campaigned for Obama after he declared his intention to run for the presidency and accompanied him on a trip to Israel in the summer of 2008.

While in Jerusalem, Obama met Netanyahu, then the leader of the opposition. Judging by their cordial encounter, Kurtzer thought there would be a meeting of minds on core issues.

"But that didn't happen," said Kurtzer, saying that Obama's call for a settlement freeze in the West Bank and Netanyahu's failure to reopen talks with the Palestinian Authority caused annoyance on both sides.

In an attempt to explain Obama's Mideast policy, Kurtzer said the president believes that Israel and the Palestinians should take advantage of the historic revolutions and revolts sweeping through the Arab world and move forward toward a negotiated peace agreement.

Netanyahu, however, regards the anti-Israel manifestations of the Arab Spring as a wake-up call and Obama's Mideast policy as a "slippery slope," he acknowledged.

Kurtzer admitted he was initially receptive to the PA's current drive for United Nations recognition of Palestinian statehood.

But a May 17 New York Times opinion piece by PA President Mahmoud Abbas, in which he wrote that "Palestine's admission to the UN would pave the way for the internationalization of the conflict as a legal matter, not only a political one," "burst my bubble," Kurtzer said.

Abbas, in effect, called for Israel's delegitimization, he noted.

Kurtzer, whose service in Israel coincided with the second Palestinian uprising, said Israel has learned how to cope with Palestinian terrorism.

But he warned that Israel faces serious threats in Hezbollah's long-range and short-range rocket capabilities and in Iran's aggressive efforts to build a nuclear arsenal.

UN Watch turns attention to human rights council

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A few years ago, Hillel Neuer was featured in a YouTube video that went viral.

Seated in front of a microphone and reading from a prepared script, the executive director of UN Watch proceeded to lambaste the UN's Human Rights Council (UNHRC), rebuking it for failing to live up to the high standards set by its inspirational creator, Eleanor Roosevelt.

Hillel Neuer

It was, as he sees it, simply speaking truth to power, reminding the delegates to the UN's prestigious human rights organization of its apparent shortcomings. Not mincing words, he even spoke of "the despots who run this council."

But the president of the body, Luis Alfonso de Alba of Mexico, who by protocol was expected to merely thank the speaker and move on, went ballistic – at least by diplomatic standards. He refused to thank Neuer, said the remarks were "inadmissible" and warned him that if he repeated such a speech in future, it would be erased from the record.

Talk about a thin skin, particularly coming from an organization that accuses Israel of everything under the sun while ignoring the many anti-woman, anti-gay, antisemitic and Holocaust-denial statements made by delegates on other occasions, Neuer said. Video of the confrontation attracted more than 531,000 hits by a global audience enthralled by the guy who stood up to the UN's human rights mandarins.

Neuer was in Toronto last week as keynote speaker at the Emunah Women of Toronto's Family in Israel Dinner.

Neuer doesn't regret his address to the council in March 2007. "The Human Rights Council is all about the power of words," he said. "As a result of the extreme reaction, the speech went viral and became the most viewed NGO speech in the history of the UN."

A subsequent video, in which UN Watch posted "admissible" statements by delegates that attacked Jews, women and gays, and which garnered thanks from the president, were juxtaposed against Neuer's "inadmissible" comments. That video attracted more than 75,000 hits.

Neuer said he won't be intimidated by warnings from the council's chair and he won't stop trying to focus the council's attention to rights abuses around the world.

"Every day spent attacking Israel is a day denied to victims in Darfur, in Chinese labour camps, in the North Korean gulag and victims of attacks in Yemen and around the globe," he said.

Neuer said UN Watch, which monitors the UNHRC's activities, has advanced some important causes in recent years, particularly "giving a voice to the voiceless."

UN Watch has brought Darfurian victims of the Sudanese government to Geneva to tell the UNHRC about their experiences. It also facilitated addresses by a Palestinian doctor and Bulgarian nurses who were jailed and tortured by the Libyan government, and it arranged for a survivor of the Tiananmen Square massacre to address the council. The latter wanted to know how the Chinese government, which mowed down its own people in the street, could have a seat on a body that ostensibly promotes human rights, Neuer said.

UN Watch also brought Israeli physician Mirela Siderer to address the council, in the presence of Richard Goldstone, who chaired a committee that produced a report on the war in Gaza that accused Israel of war crimes. Siderer, who lives in Ashkelon, was badly wounded and disfigured by a Hamas rocket that landed in her clinic. She wanted to know why the Goldstone report virtually ignored her story, despite her testimony.

UN Watch has also exposed Richard Falk, special rapporteur on human rights in the Palestinian territories, as a 9/11 skeptic who has claimed the attack was an inside job by the U.S. government. Falk was eventually condemned by UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, and "for the first time, his false halo as a human rights expert was punctured," Neuer said.

Neuer said the UNHRC "is pathologically obsessed with Israel," the only country subject to a permanent agenda item at every meeting. While the governments of Bahrain, Yemen and Saudi Arabia repress their own people, none of these countries' human rights violations will be on the UNHRC's June agenda and Iran escaped censure after it killed protesters in 2009, he said. One bright spot at the June meeting, he noted, was that Libya and Syria will be subject to reports about the current situation in those two lands.

But, as UN Watch noted recently, it's still a case of the fox guarding the chickens. Congo and Kuwait were recently elected to the UNHRC and today, "only 20 out of 47 of the [UNHRC's] new members rank as free democracies, while the rest – a majority of 58 per cent – fail to meet basic democracy standards," Neuer said.

Chabad honours Toronto teens

Compiled by CJN Staff

Toronto-area teens who have participated in Chabad Youth Network programs to help others and to study Torah will be honoured June 6 at an evening of recognition, with a dinner and an awards ceremony.

The event highlights the efforts and achivements of Teens For the Community, a program that engages teens in activities and fundraising to benefit their local communities, and Torah 4 Teens, the educational arm of the Chabad Youth Network.

The evening culminates another year of intensive, city-wide classes and programming designed to advance the youth network's goal of empowering Jewish youth with a greater sense of identity and responsibility toward their community by means of Jewish education combined with pro-active community involvement.

Since September, about 200 teen volunteers from various Toronto neighbourhoods have gathered weekly to plan, co-ordinate and implement community-oriented projects designed to serve underprivileged families, single mothers, fellow teens with cancer, needy children, the elderly and homeless.

They have visited homeless shelters, retirement residences and youth hostels. Their fundraising projects included bowl-a-thons, basketball tournaments, deliveries of food baskets to families in need and the distribution of homemade winter scarves for the homeless.

As well, another group of 200 students have regularly attended weekly classes at Torah 4 Teens, where they received a cutting-edge, ministry-approved high-school curriculum focusing on courses in Jewish philosophy and biblical commentary, including Jewish tradition, history and observance as they relate to Torah and our modern society.

The evening will highlight the youth network's activities with a welcome by newly elected member of Parliament Mark Adler, a video presentation, teens' personal observations and a parents' perspective. All students in attendance will receive a Chabad Youth Network signature hoodie.

The recognition dinner and awards ceremony will take place June 6, 7:30 to 9:30 p.m., at the Sephardic Kehila Synagogue, 7026 Bathurst St., in Thornhill.

For more information, reservations and/or sponsorship opportunities, please e-mail Chabad Youth Network at info@jewishyouth.ca, or call the office at 905-889-7582.

EXPLORING ROOTS: Students at Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School explored Kensington Market to learn about their downtown Jewish roots. The whole school visited historic Jewish buildings and learned about their history. Grade 2 students were excited to find a Magen David in the fence outside the Kiever Synagogue. Environment minister keeps Israel in plans

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Environment Minister Peter Kent, who retained his portfolio following the recent Conservative election victory, said he plans to pursue more initiatives with Israel.

Speaking to The CJN from Vancouver last week, Kent said he looks forward to discussing ways both countries can benefit from each other's environmental initiatives.

While there are no specific projects targeted at the moment, he said that "whether it's solar energy, irrigation technology and general environmental applications, there's a lot of cross-pollination that already goes on between our governments" on environmental issues.

He added: "In my renewed post as [environment] minister, I look forward to exploring any ways we can share expertise and technology with Israel."

Kent noted that Canada has also been holding "unofficial" talks with Israel to help in the ongoing reforestation of the Mount Carmel forest, where more than 4,000 hectares were destroyed last year in one of the country's worst-ever forest fires.

"Canada has an abundance of expertise in reforestation, and there may be ways we can explore to engage there," he said.

Kent said Israel's Ministry of Environmental Protection has invited him for a "visit later this year," although there's no agenda yet.

"I would expect we'd talk about areas of common interest... issues such as climate change and the adaptation technologies" related to that subject, he said.

Kent said he continues to be "honoured" to serve Thornhill, the riding with the highest proportion of Jews in the country.

"It's a remarkable constituency which demonstrates the ability [of many cultures] to coexist and work towards prosperity with each other."

A unique look at Israeli-Palestinian conflict

Marni Shankman
Co-op Student

Crescent Star, a new novel by Nicholas Maes, is a thought-provoking look at the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, as told from the perspectives of two teenagers, one a Canadian Jew living in Israel and the other a Palestinian.

Set during the spring of 2006, against the backdrop of the onset of the Second Lebanon War, Crescent Star follows the lives of the two 15-year-old boys as they struggle with the everyday challenges around them.

Avi Greenbaum, a Canadian Jew living in west Jerusalem, and Moussa Shakir, a Palestinian from east Jerusalem, are within a kilometre of each other, yet exist in completely different worlds.

While one celebrates Israeli Independence Day, the other mourns the day as "nakba", which means the catastrophe.

Surrounded by voices of hate and violence, both Avi and Moussa are on the threshold of adulthood, and have family members risking their lives in combat.

However, each questions his own fortitude when it comes to joining in the fight themselves. They are taught to be wary of each other, yet cannot seem to find the hate within themselves. Although Avi and Moussa are from very different backgrounds, they discover they are more alike than they thought.

When the boys are brought together as part of a peace initiative, each must navigate through the hostility and suspicion and decide upon their roles in the ongoing feud.

Crescent Star is a far cry from Maes' usual subject matter, which includes the fantasy-tinged Locksmith and futuristic Laughing Wolf.

However, he is no stranger to Jewish subject matter. In his first adult novel, Dead Man's Float, Maes writes of Nathan Gelder, a man paralyzed after suffering a stroke. Gelder lies half-conscious, suspended in his memories as he is forever scarred by the loss of his parents in the Holocaust. When evidence surfaces that Gelder may have been the cause of the death of a famous rock star, he pleads for a vindication that will never come.

In Crescent Star, Maes takes great care to present the Israeli-Palestinian conflict from both sides and from an unbiased and non-judgmental perspective.

"I didn't want to condemn any one side outright but rather hoped to achieve some degree of objectivity and balance," says Maes, a University of Waterloo classics professor and a history teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

"Any book on Israel is going to talk about politics. I wanted to give a personal opinion, while being fair."

Maes was originally asked by his publisher, Dundurn Press, to write a novel about Israel. But after living in Israel for a year and a half, Maes realized what a compelling place it is and wanted to share his own opinions about the country.

While the book is entirely fiction, Maes said that Crescent Star has been influenced by his life.

"In making Avi a mix of being Jewish and Canadian, it is a parallel of my own experience in Israel," he said.

Although this novel is aimed at readers between 13 and 17, it is recommended for anybody who wants to try to make sense of this complex political minefield.

Maes is currently at work on two more novels, one of which is a sequel to Laughing Wolf.

Couple to wed 45 years after first meeting

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Moshe Meirovich, spiritual leader of the Lodzer Centre Congregation, and Dr. Judith Weinroth, a general practitioner in oncology, had their first date a year ago, and plan to marry shortly after Shavuot.

But their history goes back some 45 years, to their days as teenage members of United Synagogue Youth (USY), the youth arm of the Conservative movement.

"I knew who he was," Weinroth recalled in a joint interview at the Lodzer, adding that they were too shy to talk to each other then.

Moishe, as he's known to family, was memorable at least in part because he's an identical twin. His brother, Rabbi Harvey Meirovich, recently completed a two-year stint at Beth Tzedec Congregation while on sabbatical from the Schechter Rabbinical Seminary in Jerusalem.

Judith Weinroth and Rabbi Moshe Meirovich at her grandson's brit milah in December.

Judith made an impression, too. Rabbi Meirovich remembers being in the same room with her at a couple of USY events, he said. He knew who she was, partly because her father, Rabbi Erwin Schild, was spiritual leader of Adath Israel Congregation.

Fast forward to the summer of 2007: Weinroth was about to undergo foot surgery, which would lead to her reconnecting with Rabbi Meirovich.

A year earlier, she had started taking Israeli dance classes, and gotten "hooked." But there was a downside – her feet hurt.

As it turned out, her bunion surgery was filmed for a television program, and she got to know the staff at podiatric surgeon Hartley Miltchin's office, which – she notes now – happens to overlook the Lodzer.

The staffers were determined to find her a husband, recalled Weinroth, 63, who has been divorced since the mid-1990s.

But having run singles programs at Adath Israel, and also going the JDate route, she had decided to take a break from looking.

Last May, at a follow-up appointment, Maxine Henry, who works for Miltchin, told Weinroth about someone she thought might be perfect for her – a rabbi, also divorced, who had moved back to Toronto from Cincinnati to serve at the Lodzer.

Henry, who had met the rabbi but didn't know his name, said he was a "really nice guy" who likes to dance. She also remembered that his identical twin brother is a rabbi.

"It must be Moshe Meirovich," Weinroth told her. She knew that Moshe had been a cantor in Florida, but didn't know that he had become a rabbi.

Henry encouraged Weinroth to contact Rabbi Meirovich's brother, whom Weinroth had gotten to know when he served at Adath Israel many years before. She decided to send an e-mail.

The e-mail led to a phone call from the Lodzer's new rabbi and an attempt to set up a first date. Because both were juggling hectic schedules, their first date was Tikkun Leil Shavuot at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, his parents' congregation, not far from the Lodzer.

"It was an interesting place to meet," Weinroth said, recalling the number of people who recognized them and wanted to talk. The pair took a break to walk outside, returning to hear the first lecture of the evening.

As they were leaving, she wondered if he would offer to walk her home. He did, even though it was late and it meant going out of his way.

Before he said good-bye, they talked for a long time and arranged a second date, she recalls.

The past year has brought both joys and challenges, Weinroth said. In October, the rabbi was diagnosed with prostate cancer, which has been successfully treated.

In March, on his 64th birthday, he proposed.

Their wedding will bring together four generations of family, including the couple's parents – Rabbi Schild and his wife, Laura, and Louis and Sally Meirovich, who range in age from 85 to 95.

Rabbi Schild, 91, will officiate at the ceremony, with participation from Rabbi Harvey Meirovich and Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec and Rabbi David Seed of Adath Israel.

"It's a new beginning for both of us," Weinroth said.

Both she and Rabbi Meirovich, who was married for 38 years, said they knew they wanted to remarry.

"We talk about 'bashert,'" he said. "I didn't have to make that telephone call. She didn't have to respond... Now we can look back and say, indeed, this is bashert for the two of us."

Jews urged to become organ donors

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

It's a mitzvah to donate an organ to save a life, says a leading American authority on Jewish medical ethics and Halachah.

According to Rabbi Moshe David Tendler, the mitzvah of saving a life supercedes all other commandments, except those against idolatry, murder and adultery.

Rabbi Tendler, a senior rosh yeshiva at Yeshiva University and a professor in biology – he has a PhD in microbiology – spoke about organ and tissue donation and Halachah May 17 at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre. His lecture, which drew more than 200 people, was sponsored by the Trillium Gift of Life Network, which facilitates organ donations in Ontario.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa and chair of Trillium's board, led the discussion.

Rabbi Tendler is the son-in-law of the late Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, a world-renowned halachic authority who was a strong advocate for organ donation. Much of Rabbi Tendler's lecture was based on the responsa of his late father-in-law, who recognized brain death, or "physiological decapitation," as the halachic interpretation of death.

Rabbi Tendler described "physiological decapitation" as "the complete and irreversible cessation of the functioning of the entire brain." If the brain is no longer involved in the functioning of vital organs, a person can be considered brain dead. He said the fact the heart can continue to beat with the aid of life support technology doesn't mean a person is alive.

This view is halachically contentious, because some rabbis consider a person to be alive if there is any type of body movement, including a heartbeat.

Rabbi Tendler made a distinction between brain death and cerebral death. In brain death, "there is irreversible cessation of all functioning of the brain, including the brain stem... Never in the history of brain stem death has someone improved or recovered."

With cerebral death, a person may be in a pervasive vegetative state or a permanent persistent coma, but he or she can physiologically function without life support. In such a case, Jewish law forbids organ donation, because the person has a functioning brain stem.

The rabbi said there are strict medical guidelines and a comprehensive protocol for the diagnosis of brain death.

He discussed some common objections to organ donation, such as desecration of the dead and concerns about timely burial. "If desecration of the dead occurs to save a life, it is permitted. If eight people can live, you are honouring the dead."

He also said that while Halachah mandates a quick burial, it's acceptable to delay a funeral for organ donation. "We often delay for lesser reasons than saving a human life. We wait for family members."

Rabbi Tendler's lecture was part of Trillium's outreach to faith communities to understand how organ donation fits with their respective beliefs, said Dr. Frank Markel, Trillium's president and CEO.

Markel urged prospective donors to register with Trillium, because the number of donors doesn't meet demand.

Some 1,500 people are on waiting lists, he said. "In Ontario, one person dies every three days waiting for a transplant. We lose more than 100 people a year."

For details about the donor registry, visit Trillium's website at www.giftoflife.on.ca.

A tuition plan

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

In its current form, the day school system is unsustainable. With tuition increases consistently running between two and three times the rate of inflation, more and more parents are opting out of the system. Not unlike the financial crisis, where the signs of trouble were ignored until suddenly it was too late, it behooves us to take action before the system implodes. More than a few schools across North America – including one in Toronto – have been forced to close, caught in a double whammy of decreasing enrolments and increased subsidy requests.

With study after study showing that day school education is the best guarantee of a Jewishly committed adult, a decrease in enrolments today translates into a weakened Jewish community tomorrow. More than 90 per cent of those who graduate from a Jewish high school – regardless of affiliation or denomination – marry other Jews, while those who do not, intermarry at rates of approximately 50 per cent. And getting a day school education through Grade 8 just won't do. Sadly, the impact of Jewish education is almost completely lost by the end of four formative years in the public high school system.

Even for families with multiple children who can "afford" school fees that can easily reach $75,000 a year, a retirement crisis looms as money that would be set aside for retirement are earmarked toward tuition. Furthermore thousands of Jewish babies are not being born as – and this is no joke – day school tuition has been called the most effective form of birth control.

I would like to very briefly outline the basic elements of one approach to help solve this crisis. Tuition would be cut in half. Leading philanthropists would give a 30-year, interest-free loan, essentially bridge financing, to fund the shortfall. Each family would purchase life insurance, with premiums payable for 15 years and the insurance proceeds payable to an "education fund."

Conceptually the idea is to allow parents to pay for tuition throughout their life, making such "payments" much more manageable as cash outlays would only be required for 15 years.

Let us illustrate by way of example. A husband of 35 and wife of 32 have their first of four children entering school. At today's rates, they can look forward to tuition of $850,000. Cutting that tuition in half would result in savings of $425,000. They would then spend approximately $175,000 over 15 years for insurance premiums. The net savings to the family would be $250,000.

After 30 years, the loan would be repaid using the built-up cash value of the insurance. When the second spouse passes away – let's assume in their late 80s – there will be a death benefit of somewhere between $1 million and $1.5 million dollars for Jewish education.

The above is a major, but not the only, component of a financial restructuring plan. While the challenge is great, there really are solutions. It requires hard work and thinking outside of the box. Those providing loans will see immediate returns and at the same time be laying the foundation for the most guaranteed of all investments – that of the Jewish future.

Why study Talmud?

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

It's easy to find reasons why not to study the Babylonian Talmud.

For starters, it is very old and difficult to understand. It's written in a unique combination of two archaic languages – rabbinic Hebrew and Jewish Babylonian Aramaic – and is hard to appreciate in translation. It's extremely long (well over 5,000 pages). It does not have a clear beginning; every volume of the Talmud assumes that the reader knows the contents of other volumes. It lacks an index or a useful table of contents. Large parts of it deal with very technical details of Jewish legal issues that have been in disuse for almost 2,000 years, such as rules of animal sacrifices and of ritual impurity. The everyday realities of the Talmud – the types of household implements that it assumes that people use or the types of clothing they wear – are difficult to identify. Nevertheless, tens of thousands of Jews in the world today (myself included) do not let a day go by without studying Talmud. Why?

Paul Socken of Toronto, a retired professor of French at Waterloo University, has tried to answer that question in a recent anthology that he edited, Why Study Talmud in the Twenty-First Century? To put the book together, he asked 16 respected Jewish academics and teachers to explain what attracted them (and perhaps might attract others) to take on the challenge of studying Talmud.

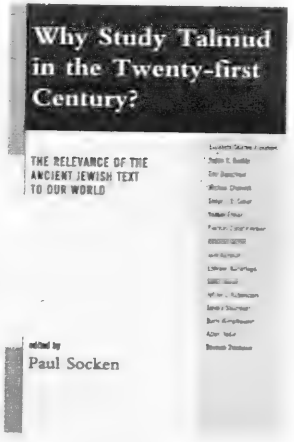
Socken wisely asked all the contributors to the volume to "teach" a talmudic text as part of their submissions. For me, these talmudic text readings (or, more accurately, most of them) were the highlight of the book. Readers who are unacquainted with the Talmud – or even those who have dipped into the sea of the Talmud at some point in their lives and found the experience unsatisfying – might discover here the joy of reading talmudic texts under the guidance of master teachers.

Yet in my opinion, the scholars did not really come up with clinching arguments as to why Jews should study Talmud today. Some of the usual reasons appear repeatedly. Talmud study is a form of problem solving that is enjoyable for the kind of people who enjoy logic puzzles or sudoku. But, of course, people can and do find other ways of satisfying this urge.

Many of the scholars also point out that you really cannot have a deep understanding of Jewish law without good knowledge of Talmud. This is certainly true, and is a good reason why rabbis (especially Conservative and Orthodox rabbis) ought to achieve a significant mastery of Talmud, a task that requires years of intense study. But why should the laity acquire such skills? Presumably, you cannot have a deep understanding of the underpinnings of Canadian law without studying English common law and perhaps other precursors of our legal system. Scholars of Canadian law would be wise, I assume, to be acquainted with the old, classical works on which it is based. The rest of us law-abiding Canadians can do without. Similarly, a Jew who wishes to know and follow Jewish law need not know Talmud.

In some well-argued, honest sections, a few scholars highlight reasons (other than those mentioned above) why modern people might not want to study Talmud. Before offering a page of reasons to study Talmud, Judith Baskin of the University of Oregon dedicates 12 pages to a scathing critique of what she calls the rabbis' assumptions about "female alterity," or the belief that women are totally "other" from men.

Shaye Cohen of Harvard University begins with some personal arguments for Talmud study (e.g., "I like old things, I always have... I adhere to the adage 'Older is better'"), but then admits that modern readers will encounter some vexing problems when they try to study Talmud: "Inevitably, we find things in the Talmud that we do not like. The Talmud... is famous for logical leaps that do not land squarely, for questions that we have trouble regarding as real questions, for answers that we have trouble regarding as real answers, for proofs that we have trouble regarding as real proofs, for inferences that are far-fetched, if not absurd, and for explanations that are unreasonable or highly contrived. I am not referring to passages that, because of their difficulty and complexity strain our intellect; these are a delight... No I am referring to passages that strain our credulity. Do they really expect me to take this seriously? we ask."



Why then do so many Jews study Talmud every day? As Azzan Yadin of Rutgers University puts it, in the pre-modern world the importance of Talmud study was always "ideologically axiomatic." Study of Torah, in the broadest sense, is one of Judaism's most crucial religious activities and, for the last 1,500 years, traditional Judaism has defined the Talmud as its core text. The measure of a pre-modern male Jew's erudition was always the level of his mastery of the Talmud.

I would argue that the overwhelming majority of Jews who study Talmud regularly today do so for those same reasons that people studied Talmud in previous generations, irrespective of the fact that they are living in the 21st century. More important to them than modern values and sensibilities (and the fact that occasionally the Talmud can be seen to be conforming with some modern values) is the traditional Jewish value system and the sincere belief that God gave a Torah to the Jewish people and one of the most important books that grapples with, explains and expands upon God's Torah is the Babylonian Talmud.

Socken made an unusual choice when editing this volume. He selected as contributors only people with academic credentials and approaches, not rabbis whose spiritual-intellectual lives revolve around the Talmud, and none of the many educated lawyers or accountants who, after a hard day at work or sometimes every morning at 6 a.m., love to spend an hour or two studying Talmud, for Jewish reasons.

In my rough estimation, less than one per cent of the Talmud study that goes on in the world today takes place in an academic setting using critical academic tools. As much as I like academic study of the Talmud, I consider it unlikely that it will take off and attract many students in the 21st century, even with the encouragement of this book. But many Jews who live deep Jewish lives will continue to study Talmud in order to come closer to understanding God's Torah.

Students share deep, dark secrets with Hillel

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

"I resent my friends that found jobs after graduation."

"I wish you'd love God less and your friends more."

Above are two examples of compelling messages anonymously sent to Hillel at York's Jewish education associate Margot Bychutsky as part of a campaign to help Hillel gain more insight into the students they aim to serve.

Toronto Secrets, an initiative modelled on the popular PostSecret website, calls on Jewish students and recent graduates from Thornhill to mail in postcards containing their deepest, darkest secrets, superimposed over images or other artwork.

Bychutsky said she was inspired by Frank Warren's PostSecret site, which was founded in 2005 as a blog experiment to give people an outlet to purge their secrets without having to fear judgment, since the messages were posted anonymously.

Bychutsky, who said she has been reading Warren's blog since she was an undergraduate York University student, said she re-structured his concept to focus on Jewish students and recent graduates from the heavily Jewish suburb.

"They are recent [Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto] grads, they don't live on campus, they commute to school," Bychutsky said.

She said she hopes the postcards will challenge the "stereotypical vision of what you think the Jewish university student is," as well as "break down the stigma of what Hillel is… People think Hillel is just a political organization, or it's just a religious organization, but it's not."

Although the postcards are sent in anonymously, Bychutsky said, "I feel like these are the 40 or 50 per cent of Jewish students on campus who, for whatever reason, have chosen not to affiliate."

Bychutsky, who has a background in religious studies as well as education, said that since she began collecting postcards in February, she's received about 200 submissions.

"I didn't think word was going to spread like this, which is kind of awesome," she said, adding that the project will soon open up to young Jews throughout Toronto.

She said the subject matter of the cards – most of which are sent electronically to an e-mail address that has a filter built in to keep the senders' identities a secret – vary from light-hearted, humorous observations, to complaints, to socially and politically relevant issues.

Considering that the target group for this initiative is Jewish students in their late teens and early 20s, the most popular topics include religion, familial pressures, education and finding a partner.

"The next person to ask me when I'm getting married gets punched in the nose. I'm only 24," reads one message written atop a wedding invitation.

One of the more compelling examples Bychutsky offered depicted a black and white image of a woman praying over Shabbat candles with a message that says, "I'm a Jew and a lesbian. How can I fix this? I've tried to pray it away and it hasn't worked."

Another says, "I resent the people who say they're praying for me because of my terminal illness. Why would God listen to their prayers and not mine?"

Bychutsky said that while the initiative is a community art project, it also serves as a way to glean information that will help Hillel better provide programming for young Jews who have yet to connect with the campus group.

"As far as programming goes, this can help us target [students] a little better based on the number of postcards that fall under a specific topic," she said.

But, as is the case with most art projects, Bychutsky expects both criticism and praise for the campaign.

"I personally have no problem pushing the envelope a little bit… I'm sure that there will be some negative critique and various people in the community might question why we would show Jewish students questioning God. If they want to come and have that conversation with me, I'm more than happy to sit down and have that conversation," she said.

Postcard submissions, which will be collected indefinitely, can be viewed on the Toronto Secrets Facebook page, which launched on May 30.

Bychutsky said they have also created posters containing images of the postcards that can be found in Thornhill-area coffee shops, including Aroma at Bathurst Street and Rutherford Road and Starbucks at Bathurst and Atkinson Avenue.

Musical world mourns composer

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Helen Medwedeff Greenberg – composer of secular and liturgical works using Hebrew, Yiddish and English texts – died May 17 at Toronto's Baycrest Hospital, of cancer. She was 71.

After being diagnosed nine years ago, Greenberg chose to open the door on life "wider than ever," continuing to compose and to tutor students, Rabbi Jarrod Grover of Beth Tikvah Synagogue said in a eulogy.

Helen Greenberg

A native of Baltimore, she studied English and secondary education at Oberlin College in Ohio, and at Goucher College in her hometown, completing her BA in 1961. In the 1980s, she freelanced for The CJN.

Greenberg, whose father was a lawyer and whose mother was a talented amateur pianist, had studied piano and voice, and sang in Oberlin's summer stock program in Falmouth, Mass.

She and her husband Charles (Chuck), whose family was originally from Montreal, moved to Canada in 1961. They settled in Montreal, and in 1967 moved to Toronto.

A longtime member of Beth Tikvah's choir, Greenberg also sang with other choirs, including the Lachan Chamber Choir.

Cantor Beny Maissner – conductor and music director of Lachan, and the cantor and musical director of Holy Blossom Temple – told The CJN in an e-mail that Greenberg, whom he'd known for 30 years, was "a special human being who was able to translate her kind and soft character into the language of music.

"Her... unique deep and profound understanding of the connection between poetry and music allowed her to create a perfect synthesis of the arts. Her gentle soul is reflected in her sensitive compositions. Helen will be missed by the musical world."

Greenberg was a student of Canadian composers Oskar Morawetz, Edward Laufer and Srul Irving Glick, who was composer-in-residence and choir director at Beth Tikvah for 32 years until his death in 2002. The late Canadian opera star Maureen Forrester premiered one of Greenberg's compositions.

Greenberg's work has been performed in Canada, the United States, Europe and Israel, and has been featured on several CDs, including one recorded by the New York-based Jewish People's Philharmonic Chorus, and her own 1994 CD, Magic Breath.

As well, her music is part of the repertoire for cantorial students at Hebrew Union College, the Jewish Theological Seminary and Gratz College. Tribute was paid to her at last week's Cantors' Assembly convention, held in Toronto.

On both a professional and personal level, Greenberg garnered the respect of everyone she met, Rabbi Grover told The CJN.

She had "a generous spirit, tremendous loyalty, and not an ounce of pretention," he said in his eulogy.

Greenberg leaves her husband Chuck, daughter Susan Berger of Olney, Md., son Mark, of Tampa, and three grandchildren.

Dairy as comfort food

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

To me, dairy food is comfort food. Cream cheese spread on almost anything from bagels to celery sticks, velvety smooth and gooey macaroni and cheese, Greek salad loaded with feta – oh, and grilled cheddar cheese sandwiches – scrumptious!

To conclude a dairy meal, or just for fun, my first choice would be ice cream. Chocolate chip is my favourite, but in a pinch, any flavour will do. If I want to better ice cream (and that would be difficult to do), I suppose I could choose a slice of cheesecake covered with fresh strawberries and drizzled with strawberry sauce, or possibly a little ramekin prepared with a very decadent vanilla bean crème brûlée. Aren't you already feeling comforted by my soothing list of dairy foods?

Blintzes are a traditional Shavuot food
[The Hadassah Jewish holiday cookbook]

Dairy meals, considered a light meal choice, are ideal for Shavuot. Similarly, dairy dishes are grand to serve before Shabbat and other holidays, in order to allow us to take a break the day before heavy, meat meals are served. Furthermore, dairy dishes are marvellous for quick and easy summer meals. They are also among the most popular Jewish recipes. Consider dairy, not as a snack or a side dish, but as playing a prominent role at your dining table.

BAKED SPINACH PASTRIES

Serve these pastries as an appetizer or as a side dish with soup or salad.

Dough
1 cup margarine or butter
1 egg
1 1/2-2 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
warm water 1-2 tbsp.
extra flour for rolling

Filling
6 oz. grated cheddar cheese cooked spinach, chopped (see note)
3 egg yolks

Garnish
1 egg yolk
1 tsp. water
sesame seeds

Melt the margarine or butter. In food processor, combine margarine and egg with 1-1/2 cups of flour and the other dry ingredients. While processor is running, slowly add water until mixture forms a ball. Remove ball from food processor and add more flour to dough if mixture is too wet to roll. Roll out the dough on a floured board, Cut into 3-4-inch rounds.

In a bowl, mix all the filling ingredients together and place a tablespoon of filling in the middle of each round. Fold dough over filling, making a crescent shape, and pinch sides together. Whisk egg yolk and water together and brush each pastry with mixture. Sprinkle pastry with sesame seeds.

Line a baking sheet with parchment paper, and place pastries two inches apart. Bake in the oven at 375 for about 25 minutes until golden.

Note: Use 8 oz. fresh spinach. Wilt in microwave 1-2 minutes, then wrap spinach in a paper towel and squeeze out the water.

SUPREME EGG SALAD

Delicious in a sandwich, or scoop it onto your favourite salad.

12 eggs
1/2 cup salad dressing or mayonnaise
1/4 cup light cream cheese
2 tsp. prepared yellow mustard
1/4 cup sweet pickle relish
2 ribs of celery, small dice
2/3 cup grated cheddar cheese
1/2 tsp. salt or to taste
1/4 tsp. pepper

Place eggs in a medium size pot and cover them with water. On a high heat, bring the water to a rapid boil and turn burner off. Place the lid on the pot and leave it on the burner for 20 minutes. Drain hot water from pot and run cold water over eggs until cool to the touch. Drain water from pot, then, with lid on, shake pot. This will crack the eggs and make them easier to peel. Peel eggs and mash. Add the salad dressing and the cream cheese and mix well. Add remaining ingredients and continue to mix until combined.

ICE CREAM SANDWICH CAKE

Your family will fall in love with this cake the second they taste it. They will never ever guess that it's made with ice cream sandwiches. You can change this cake for different occasions. Change the candy topping to chocolate chips, M&M'S, candy sprinkles or crushed cookie crumbs. Add chocolate or butterscotch syrup for an even more decadent dessert.

2 boxes of ice cream sandwiches, approximately 20
1 large container of Cool Whip
1 package of Skor Toffee Bits

Line the bottom of a 9x11-inch Pyrex cake pan with ice cream sandwiches, Use as many ice cream sandwiches as you need to completely cover the bottom of the pan, cutting ice cream sandwiches in pieces if necessary.

Spread a generous layer of Cool Whip on top of the ice cream sandwiches. Sprinkle Skor pieces over the Cool Whip. Place another layer of ice cream sandwiches over the cool whip, repeat Cool Whip layer and Skor pieces. Cover tightly with plastic wrap and freeze. To serve, cut cake into squares and lift each square out of Pyrex pan with an offset spatula. The cake cuts easily right out of the freezer.

Note: You can use any size cake pan depending on the number of guests you are feeding. Just increase or decrease the number of ice cream sandwiches.

Canada imposes sanctions on Syria

Prime Minister Stephen Harper

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Prime Minister Stephen Harper announced last week that Canada has imposed "targeted" sanctions on Syria.

In a statement last Monday, Harper said his government was responding to the Syrian regime's "ongoing and violent crackdown by the military and security forces against Syrian civilians who are peacefully protesting for democracy and the respect of human rights."

The sanctions, as outlined by the government, include: "a travel ban imposed on designated people associated with the current Syrian regime; an asset freeze against people associated with the current Syrian regime and entities involved in security and military operations against the Syrian people; a ban under the Export and Import Permits Act on the export from Canada to Syria of goods and technology that are subject to export controls, and, a suspension of all bilateral co-operation agreements and initiatives with Syria."

Canada's sanctions are not intended to "cause harm" to the Syrian people, Harper said.

"The best way to ensure peace and stability in Syria is through democratic reform and respect for human rights, not violent repression," Harper said.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, praised Canada's stance.

"We are happy to see Canada join with others within the international community in signalling the unacceptability of the [Syrian President Bashar] Assad regime's brutal repression of the Syrian people as well as their destructive influence on Lebanon to the north," he said. "The application of the Special Economic Measures Act serves as an expeditious way to deny Syria the privileges of Canadian friendship."

Canada imposed similar sanctions on Iran last summer.

The United States and European Union had imposed sanctions on Syria earlier last month.

"The sanctions being announced... are a repudiation of Syria's blatant violation of its international human rights obligations that threaten the security of the entire Middle East," Harper concluded.

Aside from reports of massive government repression of its citizenry, Syria also harbours representatives of 10 Palestinian terror groups, including Hamas, Islamic Jihad, the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine, and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, which all oppose peace talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

Papers diverge on what Israeli PM said

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On May 25, the day after Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu addressed a joint session of the U.S. Congress, the contrast in the front-page headlines of Canada's two national newspapers could not have been starker: "Tough-talking Netanyahu refuses to budge" (Globe and Mail); "'Six words will change history'" (National Post).

The "six words" in the Post's title, as explained in Sheldon Alberts's story, refer to Netanyahu's call for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to announce publicly: "I will accept a Jewish state."

Alberts cited Netanyahu's crucial statement: "Our conflict has never been about the establishment of a Palestinian state. It has always been about the existence of a Jewish state." This reflects an Israeli consensus about the crux of the conflict, though it has been almost entirely ignored in western media circles.

Not a trace of that statement is to be found in Paul Koring's Globe report. Rather, Koring dwelled on what he took to be the intransigent position of "the hard-line Israel leader." As Koring summarized it: "Jerusalem must remain undivided and in Israeli hands; there will be no return of Palestinian refugees or their millions of descendants to Israel; and the sprawling suburbs of east Jerusalem, home to hundreds of thousands of Jewish settlers, must be ceded to Israel."

According to Alberts, showing flexibility, "Mr. Netanyahu for the first time conceded that he recognized 'in a genuine peace we will be required to give up parts of the ancestral Jewish homeland,' referring to the occupied West Bank."

But according to Koring, "Mr. Netanyahu offered only the tiniest glimmers of hope for the long-stalled peace process." Koring dismissed Netanyahu's remark, "I'm willing to make painful compromises to achieve this historic peace," writing, "but [Netanyahu] gave no hint as to what they might be." No trace of what in Alberts's story is a first-time concession from Netanyahu is to be found in Koring's.

Whereas Alberts noted Netanyahu's rejection of negotiations unless Abbas renounces unity with Hamas, an organization that seeks Israel's destruction, Koring didn't even mention the unity agreement and its impact.

While Alberts did include critical comments from Palestinian spokespeople – concluding on a note about Netanyahu's "uncompromising line on Palestinian refugees and the future of Jerusalem" – his report was balanced. Koring's was not only one-sided, it veered sharply into opinion. As Koring wrote: "By disagreeing with Mr. Obama [about the 1967 lines], and uttering crowd-pleasing lines to Congress and AIPAC, Mr. Netanyahu was essentially playing to an audience back home." How does Koring know this is what Netanyahu was "essentially" doing?

There is also an important factual mistake in Koring's report. It's not the case, as he wrote, that Canada regards east Jerusalem, the West Bank and Gaza as "unlawfully occupied" by Israel. UN Security Council Resolution 242 allows Israel to legitimately hold territory taken in a war of self-defence pending peace agreements.

Returning to Netanyahu's call for the Palestinians to recognize the right of the Jewish people to their own state, just as Israel recognizes the same right for the Palestinians, let's remember that it was Obama himself who, in his May 19 State Department address, spoke of the need to recognize Israel as the "Jewish State."

However, the Palestinian demand of a "right of return" to Israel is radically inconsistent with Obama's call for accepting Israel's "Jewish" character. Instead of saying, as his predecessor had, that any "return" would have to be confined to a Palestinian state, Obama chose to leave the refugee issue open for future discussion, which, to some analysts, only confused matters.

Koring might be piqued that Netanyahu said the Palestinian refugee problem "will be resolved outside the borders of Israel." If so, he should recall the renowned Palestinian intellectual Sari Nusseibeh's brave advice: "The Palestinians have to realize that if we are to reach an agreement on two states, then those two states will have to be one for the Israelis and one for the Palestinians, not one for the Palestinians and the other also for the Palestinians" (New York Times, Oct. 17, 2001).

Israeli embassy vandalized

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – Just a day after Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's much-publicized and controversial visit to Washington ended, the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa was the scene of vandalism.

On the morning of May 25, graffiti was found spraypainted on the sidewalk on Queen and Albert streets outside the building that houses the Israeli Embassy, as well as several others, and on an adjacent wall.

"Israel War Crimes" and "Embassy of War Crimes" appeared in large letters, leaving no doubt which embassy was being targeted.

Sgt. David Harper, diplomatic liaison officer for the RCMP, said that "the investigation is ongoing between the RCMP and the Ottawa city police." The RCMP's mandate is national security and it deals with all foreign missions in Canada.

"This does not fall into the category of a hate crime," Harper said, although he added that it was definitely politically motivated.

"The obvious charge is public mischief," he said, which is why Ottawa police are also involved in the investigation.

"It could be a random act, but we don't know. Given the heightened tension against Israel, we have seen increased demonstrations."

Harper said police will be contacting building management to review security video recordings.

A spokesperson for the embassy declined to comment on the investigation, saying it was embassy policy not to speak to the media on such matters.

Canadians' generosity 'beyond expectations'

Canadians have supported the centre in the past, and in fact, their generosity has gone "beyond expectations," Raif said. More than $1 million has been raised here and transferred directly to the Peres Center in Israel.

It continues to support a variety of ambitious social programs. In addition to the medical assistance program, it has also created a sports program in which Palestinian and Israeli youngsters participate in athletics together; it funds a medical training program that brings Palestinian doctors to Israeli hospitals to upgrade their skills and knowledge, and it's establishing a project to address "the disease of the century" – obesity and diabetes, Raif said.

The Peres Center has also branched out into other areas of potential co-operation, he continued. It is encouraging young people from both communities to get together to develop their creative abilities in the area of visual arts, theatre and music.

Arie Raif

Raif, a businessman and former Israeli consul in Toronto, said he takes great satisfaction from the centre's efforts to promote artistic endeavours. "It makes me feel that I'm doing something positive," he stated.

The Canadian wing of the Peres Center is led by a 21-person board of governors and a board of directors, and it has hired two employees.

Building on the organization's reputation, Raif expects to raise as much as $2 million this year.

Quoting the president, he said "the pillars" that could lead to regional peace are the promotion of economic co-operation with the Arab world and engaging in humanitarian activities.

"Peres said in spite of our differences, we can build peace, not just negotiate peace. We can create an environment and not just become the victims of the existing environment," Raif said.

Flooding at London JCC cancels walk

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Extensive damage caused to the London Jewish Community Centre by a severe rainstorm that flooded streets, homes and buildings led to the cancellation of a local Yom Yerushalayim Walk.

The event, which was scheduled for June 5 and was meant to stop at the city's three shuls – Temple Israel of London, Congregation Beth Tefilah and Congregation Or Shalom – before ending at the JCC for a barbecue lunch, was cancelled due to water damage at the centre, said its programming director, Einat Gurman.

"There was a really bad, rainy weekend and most of the city was flooded. We had lots of water coming through from the sewers," she said, referring to a May 14 storm that dumped about 30 millimetres of rain on London, Ont.

"There was a lot of damage to our venues, and we decided we can't do anything until we fix it."

The walk, which was expected to attract more than 150 members of the London Jewish community, was just one of the events that had to be cancelled or moved.

"None of the rooms that we have are available for any events. All the events we had scheduled have either been cancelled or moved to a different venue, but luckily we don't really plan anything for the summer. We didn't have to cancel or move many things, only one or two events," Gurman said.

She said the centre's two main halls, as well as the London Holocaust Resource Centre and the computer room for the Hebrew day school, were damaged.

"We still have other areas that weren't affected. We have a daycare here. We have a babysitting service here... all those things are still running."

Gurman said she hopes the repairs to the centre will be completed by September, when programming picks up again.

She said that the centre's insurance company has been touring the facility to assess the damage.

Arens to speak in Montreal

Compiled by CIN Staff

MONTREAL — Moshe Arens, Israel's defence and foreign affairs minister in the 1980s and '90s, will make a rare public appearance in North America to speak in Montreal.

Moshe Arens

Now 85, Arens will be the keynote speaker at a dinner benefiting the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR), June 15 at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

The independent Israel advocacy organization was thrilled when Arens accepted its invitation.

"I think it's a clear endorsement of the efforts of CIJR," said acting director David Pariser.

Arens, who unsuccessfully challenged Benjamin Netanyahu for the Likud party leadership in 1999, today writes a column for Ha'aretz.

He hasn't said what he'll speak about, but in 1994, he wrote the book Broken Covenant: American Foreign Policy and the Crisis Between the U.S. and Israel.

First elected to the Knesset in 1974, Arens chaired its committee on foreign affairs and security from 1977 to 1982. He was then ambassador to Washington for a year before entering the cabinet.

Born in Lithuania, he spent his youth in the United States before making aliyah in 1948. He lost his Knesset seat in 2003.

The basic ticket price for the CIJR fundraiser is $360. Donors of at least $1,000 will be invited to an "insider reception" June 14 at a private home, where they can meet Arens, as well as the event's other guest speaker, Mideast analyst Barry Rubin.

Making a difference, one glass at a time

Laura Fixman
Intern

Many kids start lemonade stands, but the difference is that Amanda Belzowski and Jaime and Alexandra Eckler contribute the funds they raise to good causes.

Amanda's Lemonade Stand started when she was two years old. The 13-year-old has now passed it on to her five-year-old brother, Joshua, who raised $9,000 in his first year. She is now running Lemon-stock, an event that will feature a battle of the bands and Canadian singer Danny Fernandes, who's won two Rising Star awards in the Canadian National Exhibition dance contest. Lemon-stock takes place on June 26, and Amanda said it will be successful because it's fun for her and other kids her age.

"You can make a difference as long as you're doing something you love," she said.

Amanda said one of the best parts about running her lemonade stand for so many years was having kids come up to her and say she inspired them to get involved. She said that she wanted others to experience the feeling she gets from giving back.

"You're never too little to make a big difference," Amanda said.

Jaime was one of the kids inspired by Amanda's Lemonade Stand. When she went to the stand with her mother, Sharon Zohar, she asked if she could start one of her own with her sister. She wanted the proceeds to go to the homeless. Zohar said that Jaime has always been very sensitive to the difficulties of the homeless, and she thought that her wish that people would no longer be homeless would never come true.

"I told her that it starts with wishes, and it continues with doing actions," Zohar said.

This will be the third annual Lemonade and Recycle Art Show for Jaime and Alexandra. Last year, they raised about $3,500 for Raising the Roof, a charity dedicated to finding long-term solutions to homelessness. This year, Zohar hopes that their event on June 5 raises $5,000 for Eva's Initiatives, a Toronto youth shelter that houses 114 young people each night. The event will be held in Woburn Park in Toronto from 1 to 4 p.m. Jaime said that she hopes this year's event is fun for everyone.

"I like to see the smiles on peoples' faces," she said.

The money Amanda makes at Lemon-stock will go to three separate charities this year, and she's looking for a company to match that donation. She will donate the proceeds to Soles for Souls, which provides shoes for children who can't afford them, the Hospital for Sick Children and Save a Child's Heart, an Israeli charity that provides heart surgeries and followup care for children in developing countries.

She said she hopes that her Lemon-stock event will inspire other children to get involved because that will help make a big difference in the world.

"If you can inspire one child, that brings with them a whole family that supports them," Amanda said.

Although Jaime and Alexandra are only seven and five years old, Zohar said that they will gradually take on more of the responsibility for the event. She said that they are already inspiring their friends, which makes them enthusiastic about the event every year.

"Slowly, I'll pass more of the baton on to them," Zohar said. "I want this to be something that's important for them to continue."

Zohar added that they are getting the homeless youths from Eva's Initiative involved in the event. Zohar and her children taught them how to make art with recycled materials, and the youths will have the opportunity to sell the artwork at the event.

Amanda also hopes to get people involved in her Lemon-stock event. "Anyone from one years old to 100 years old can get involved," she said.

Amanda added that she hoped Lemon-stock would be an annual event that will bring people together. Zohar has similar hopes for Jaime and Alexandra's lemonade stand.

"Lemonade stands are a universal way to bring a community together," Zohar said.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

The second annual Jam 4 Israel event hopes to raise $60,000 to open a summer sports camp for at-risk youth in Bat Yam, Israel, including a large population of Ethiopian Jews.

The event was started by 20-year-old Elissa Grossman, who said she wanted to honour her late grandfather, Alex Grossman, who was very involved in projects in Bat Yam. She said he was the one who taught her to get involved, and she hopes this event will make a difference in Israel.

"We're looking to raise twice as much money as last year," Grossman said.

The UJA Federation of Greater Toronto event is run entirely by young people aged 19 to 25, including Grossman and her 22-year-old co-chair, Josh Howard. Grossman thinks that this is one of the reasons the event is so successful.

"Many young people were looking for a way to get involved," she said.

The June 4 event starts at 9 p.m at Tequila Jacks in downtown Toronto. Some 650 tickets were pre-sold, but with a venue capacity of 750, Grossman is hoping for a sell-out.

The main sponsor will be Howard Sokolowski, former co-owner of the Toronto Argonauts, who will be present for what Grossman calls the "adult" portion of the event.

The "adult" portion will begin earlier and be more appropriate for people over 30, she said, adding that it will open up the evening to anyone over 19. The adult part of the evening will include dinner, dancing, casino tables and an open bar.

Other event sponsors include Sokolowski's wife, Senator Linda Frum, as well as Hart Entertainment, El Al airlines and David Cynamon, who co-owned the Argos with Sokolowski. Others slated to attend the adult event include Larry Tannenbaum, chairman of Maple Leaf Sports and Entertainment, and Warren Kimel, CEO of Fabricland.

"I hope that this event creates awareness, but also that we have a big turnout at the adult event, which is the big twist this year," Grossman said.

There will also be a draw for several prizes, including passes to Canada's Wonderland, a massage at the Hyatt Spa and dinner for four at Sotto Sotto.

Grossman said the expected turnout for Jam 4 Israel makes it the largest federation event after the Walk with Israel. It's considered a followup to the Hoops 4 Israel event, a charity basketball tournament that took place in April and also benefits youth in Bat Yam. The Birthright Israel Alumni Community is also a partner in Jam 4 Israel.

There is a minimum donation of $50 required to attend Jam 4 Israel. Donations can be made before the event at www.jam4israel.com.

MEETING AT THE TOWER OF DAVID

In honour of Jerusalem Day (28 Iyar), which fell this year on June 1, Israel's cabinet met Sunday at the Tower of David Museum in the Old City of Jerusalem. At the meeting, Prime Minster Benjamin Netanyahu said: "The government and the nation are committed to Jerusalem, which is one of the foundations of the Israeli people's unity. It's important that the world know we're committed to Jerusalem. We stand firm and extend a hand to our neighbours." Last week, Netanyahu reaffirmed Israel's commitment to a unified city of Jerusalem when he spoke at a joint session of the U.S. Congress. Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat is seated at Netanyahu's right.

Amnesty urges no death penalty

The Israel Defence Forces should rescind its reported demand that the suspects in the Itamar stabbing attacks be given the death penalty, Amnesty International said in a statement. The army is reported as intending to seek the death penalty for the suspected murderers of five members of the Fogel family in Itamar in March. It would mark the first time the army has sought a sentence of death since the mid-1990s. Responding to the Ha'aretz report, the Israeli chapter of Amnesty International urged military prosecutors to drop the demand saying that the news was "cause for grave concern." Amnesty said "the murder of the Fogel family was a heinous crime, but exaction is a punishment that has no place in today's criminal justice system."

U.S to help with missiles

The Pentagon is planning to help Israel buy four more Iron Dome short-range anti-rocket batteries, the head of the Pentagon's Missile Defence Agency said. "In our budget, we have a proposal to assist with procurement of four more batteries," Army Lieut-Gen. Patrick O'Reilly, the agency's director, told the U.S. Senate appropriations defence subcommittee. The batteries consist of a mobile air defence system with a radar-guided interceptor missile launched from a truck-sized firing platform. The goal was to spur production and deployment of the system, the first direct U.S. investment in the project. On April 7, the system successfully intercepted a rocket from Gaza for the first time. O'Reilly said he considered Iron Dome to have been "highly effective" in combat, but Israel faced a "daunting task".

Israeli firm on Iran sanctions list

An Israeli company is among seven newly sanctioned by the United States for dealings with Iran. Ofer Brothers Group is being sanctioned for its role in providing a tanker valued at $8.65 million to an Iranian shipping company. The company "failed to exercise due diligence and did not heed publicly available and easily obtainable information that would have indicated that they were dealing with" Islamic Republic of Iran Shipping Lines, the State Department said last week in releasing the names of seven companies it's adding to the list of those sanctioned for dealing with Iran's energy sector.

Israeli books banned in Scottish municipality

JTA

GLASGOW — A Scottish municipality has banned from its libraries books by Israeli authors and that were printed or published in Israel.

The West Dunbartonshire Council, consisting of towns and villages west of Glasgow, ordered new books by Israeli authors to be banned from the council's libraries, according to reports.

The ban reportedly was ordered after last year's raid by Israeli commandos on a ship attempting to break Israel's blockade on Gaza that led to the death of nine Turkish nationals. The ban followed a decision made 2-1/2 years ago following the Gaza war to boycott goods produced in Israel. According to that law, the council and all its public bodies are forbidden to sell goods that originated from Israel.

A West Dunbartonshire Council spokesperson told the UK Express that the boycott is not retrospective and that no books have been removed from libraries.

The council told the Express that 10 other councils had agreed to join the boycott.

The Scottish city Dundee also issued a recommendation to boycott goods produced in Israel, but it was set aside after city legal advisers said it was likely illegal under European Union law. The city instead will distribute posters throughout the city asking its residents not to buy Israeli goods and place a special sticker on products that are made in Israel.

"A place that boycotts books is not far from a place that burns them," Israel's ambassador to the United Kingdom, Ron Prosor, told Ynet last week.

European Jewish Congress president Moshe Kantor called the banning of Israeli books and the marking of Israeli products in Scotland "eerily reminiscent of darker times, and perhaps there is a level of hatred that connects them.

"While those behind the boycott will claim that this is not antisemitic, targeting the only Jewish state, a democracy, while ignoring serial human rights-abusing nations tells us that this is indeed antisemitic in intent and in effect," Kantor said. "This demonstrates how far 'respectable antisemitism' has come. Clearly, it has become acceptable to boycott and discriminate against Jews, as long as there is a thin veneer of anti-Zionism which purportedly covers the hateful act."

Pakistani official ordered Chabad attack, court hears

JTA

CHICAGO — A Pakistani government intelligence official directed terrorists to attack the Mumbai Chabad house in their November 2008 rampage through the Indian city, a witness in a terror trial testified.

David Coleman Headley, a Pakistani American who has confessed to conducting surveillance on the site and other targets in Mumbai for the Lashkar-e-Taiba terrorist group, gave the testimony in Chicago federal court last week at the trial of an alleged accomplice.

Headley testified that his handler was an official of Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence Directorate, identified as Major Iqbal.

"Major Iqbal told me the Chabad house would be added on whatever list" of targets, Headley said, "because it was a front office for the Mossad."

There is no evidence for the assertion of a link between the Chabad house and the Mossad, Israel's foreign intelligence service.

Pakistan has denied involvement in the Mumbai attacks, which left at least 164 people dead. Six people, including three Americans, were murdered at the Chabad house.

'Protocols' broadcast opposed

JTA

CARACAS — Venezuela's largest Jewish advocacy group has protested to the government about a state-run radio broadcast that positively referenced the antisemitic Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

In a formal complaint filed last week, the Venezuelan Confederation of Israelite Associations denounced the broadcast in which journalist Cristina Gonzalez read the infamous text and suggested that listeners should read it.

"Venezuelan Jews know that promoting this antisemitic document only sow hate and discrimination, violating the Constitution of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela," the confederation said in a statement.

During the broadcast, Gonzalez expressed her admiration for the Jewish community and "non-Zionist" Israelis before plucking what she called "little pearls" from the book to explain to listeners why Zionists have been able to amass a concentration of power and wealth.

"I do not have an antisemitic stance. I'm not anti-anything. I read everything that falls my way," she said.

The Protocols, written at about the turn of the 20th century, purportedly describes a Jewish plan for achieving global domination. It has been proven to be a fraud.

Confederation president Salomon Cohen has requested a formal investigation into the matter and a meeting with government officials.

Last year, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez met with Jewish community representatives to discuss what they described as an incessant barrage of antisemitic commentaries on state-affiliated media. Chavez took to the airwaves and formally denounced antisemitism, saying it had no place in a revolutionary society.

Subsequently, the confederation said, there was a noticeable decrease in antisemitic rhetoric. Additional diplomatic signals from the Chavez government suggested that relations between the community and the state were improving.

However, antisemitism seems to be percolating again among the most radical elements of government supporters, as Chavez gears up for what is expected to be a hard-fought campaign for re-election next year.

Canada supports negotiated two-state solution

"I would like to see reference to elements that were also in President Obama's speech, such as... the fact that one of the states must be a Jewish state. The fact that the Palestinian state must be de-militarized. I think it's important that any statement on this be balanced," Harper said.

Obama presented his Middle East policy to the G8 as an alternative to a unilateral Palestinian move to seek support for statehood in the UN General Assembly in September, and to clarify to the Palestinians that the international community takes a dim view of the Palestinians' move to win statehood in the United Nations.

Harper's government also does not support any plans by the Palestinians to attempt a unilateral declaration of independence at the UN this September, according to the PMO.

Speaking to reporters in Ottawa last week prior to the G8 meeting, Claude Carrière, the prime minister's foreign affairs and defence policy adviser, said Canada's position on a peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority is "well-known."

"The government of Canada supports... a two-state solution that is negotiated. It has to be a negotiation of the two parties. It cannot be [a] unilateral action," Carrière said.

In his recent speech to the U.S. Congress, Netanyahu told Americans that insisting on the pre-1967 borders as a condition for peace talks with the Palestinians was a non-starter for Israel.

"In the Middle East, the only peace that will hold is a peace you can defend," he said.

Reports out of Israel said Netanyahu's office reached out to Canada last week to ask for support in ensuring that any G8 statement not refer to the 1967 borders.

Last Tuesday, after his address to Congress, Netanyahu reportedly phoned Harper to ask for his help in this matter, according to a Israeli senior government official.

The official said Netanyahu told Harper that mentioning the issue of the 1967 borders in the statement without mentioning the other issues, such as Israel as a Jewish state or opposition to the return of Palestinian refugees to Israel, would be detrimental to Israeli interests and a reward to the Palestinians.

On Monday, Dimitri Soudas, a spokesperson for Harper, told The CJN that Harper had spoken with Netanyahu along with other leaders last week, but that a request from Netanyahu never happened.

"Actually, there was no G8 discussion with Prime Minister Netanyahu," Soudas said. "The prime minister's views are long-standing and well-known on the Middle East process towards a two-state solution."

However, Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman spoke last weekend with Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird and thanked him for Canada's position during the G8 deliberations, calling the country "a true friend of Israel."

Don't sail to Gaza, Baird urges Canadians

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Foreign Minister John Baird released a statement on Sunday to mark the one-year anniversary of the Gaza flotilla incident in which he asked Canadians to refrain from participating in any future flotillas, and he took the opportunity to call for the release of Gilad Schalit.

"I strongly urge those wishing to deliver humanitarian goods to the Gaza Strip to do so through established channels. Unauthorized efforts to deliver aid are provocative and, ultimately, unhelpful to the people of Gaza," Baird said.

He added that Canada recognizes Israel's "legitimate security concerns," including its right to protect itself and its citizens from attacks by Hamas and "other terrorist groups, including by preventing the smuggling of weapons."

Baird said there are more "legitimate and constructive" ways for Canadians to aid Gazans, such as donations to the International Committee of the Red Cross/Red Crescent.

Baird's statement came amid reports that an umbrella group representing about 100 Canadian organizations says it plans to send a Canadian boat, named the Tahrir, to the Gaza Strip as part of the second international "Freedom Flotilla."

The statement also came a year after Israeli marines stormed the Mavi Marmara, the flagship of an international aid flotilla bound for Gaza, killing nine Turkish activists and drawing worldwide condemnation.

This time, the flotilla is to comprise some 15 ships from several countries.

In his plea for Schalit, Baird said that "Canada continues to call for the immediate return of Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, held by Hamas for almost five years, to his family in Israel."

Schalit was captured by Hamas in a cross-border raid on June 25, 2006. Despite ongoing international diplomatic pressure, Schalit has not been allowed visitation by any international agency to determine his condition or communication with his family, save for a September 2009 video released by Hamas in which the soldier said he was "being treated well" by his captors.

Last week, Baird also condemned Iran's election to a seat on the UN Commission on Population and Development.

He said Canada "vocally opposed" Iran's candidacy and then voted against it at the UN to "ensure the continued credibility of the commission," but to no avail.

"Canada remains extremely troubled by the outrageous human rights abuses committed by Iran against its own citizens, and by Iran's threats and actions to undermine the safety, security and stability of its neighbours."

Israeli NGO narrows country's social, economic gap

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

In Jewish tradition, the highest form of charity is to help someone in need become self-sufficient.

In Israel, a group of successful entrepreneurs have adopted that credo, but with a slight modification. They believe in helping "close the social gap," but they don't consider it charity. Rather, it's an investment, in which they put their own money into Israel's human capital.

"There is a trend in Israel that a lot of people from the high-tech industry are contributing back to the country, because we care about the big social gap in Israel, the gap in education and social-economic situation, between the centre and the periphery," said Benny Levin, vice-chair of the Israel Venture Network.

IVN was established 11 years ago as a members' club, but it's operated like a business that demands measurable results, said Levin.

"We are trying to build a different philanthropy in Israel," one that not only boosts the educational achievements of children outside the Tel Aviv core, but one that helps local businesses succeed and employ people who would otherwise require charitable assistance.

IVN is seeking partners from the Jewish Diaspora to put their money into Israeli ventures that help lift people out of poverty and become self-reliant, Levin said.

Levin, founder and former CEO of NICE Systems, a high tech firm involved in software and business analytics, was in Toronto to make his pitch to a select group of potential "investors."

About 35 people gathered for a get-acquainted meeting sponsored by the consulate general of Israel in Toronto, the Israel Economic Mission to Canada and IVN. Dubbed "Start-up Nation Meets Social Entrepreneurship," the event was meant "to expose them [IVN], to provide them publicity and to get the feel for the Toronto community," said Jonathan Levy, Israel's Toronto-based consul for economic affairs.

Benny Levin

"It's a new and novel approach," Levy said. "It's certainly one that has received very high attention. It's different than other types of philanthropic institutions in Israel. It is initiated by Israelis and Israelis are the ones who will carry the majority of the cost and time."

Levin said he devotes half his time and puts $50,000 a year into the project, "more if needed."

In 2010 IVN raised $1 million (US), 60 per cent from Israelis, the remainder from Diaspora Jews.

Run as a membership organization, fees range from $5,000 to $50,000, and contributors receive full documentation about their investment. They can direct their funds to specific projects they favour, Levin said.

In one of its first big projects, IVN addressed the Israeli education gap. Israeli results in international math competitions have fallen dramatically, he said.

Twenty years ago, Israeli students' scores were often found at or near the top, but more recently, those numbers have fallen to around 38th internationally. Within Israel, matriculation results vary widely, with well-to-do communities recording graduation rates of 80 per cent, but towns such as Bnei Brak reaching only 11 per cent.

"If that doesn't change, it will be worse in the future as kids are not being trained to get a decent job," Levin said.

IVN and its partners abroad have lobbied the government to devote more resources to education, but it has also initiated its own programs. Recognizing that principals are critical to educational results but are not specially trained for the job, IVN borrowed from the high-tech model and launched its own training program.

Two hundred people applied, but funding restrictions limited the number of participants to 30. They were taught budgeting, human resource management, workplace measurement and evaluation and other management skills, Levin said.

Over the course of two years, principals met monthly, studied a curriculum developed by IVN, were mentored and helped to manage their schools.

The program proved so successful that the Ministry of Education initiated its own training program that will involve all 3,000 Israeli principals.

"This is a big change," said Levin. "The third sector [civil society] acted as a startup, got it going and turned it over to the government, and now the government runs it."

Though education is a government responsibility, IVN demonstrated results in literacy level in Tiberias. After IVN suggested new ways to teach reading, results over three years showed the number of Grade 2 students experiencing difficulties dropped from 35 per cent to nine per cent.

IVN also became involved in aiding northern Israel businesses that were devastated by the 2006 Lebanon war. Many small businesses collapsed and the government's response was to offer small loans.

"But that was not enough. We trained 30 business consultants in the north, and we trained government bureaucrats that helped small business and worked with them. We trained them so they could develop their businesses and become successful."

Working in conjunction with Tzafona, an Israeli NGO, IVN helped 500 businesses by offering the operators the kind of training they might have received in business school. Some 200 million shekels ($56 million) was invested in the project, with the expectation that better-trained business people will keep their ventures afloat and hire more people.

IVN is now ready to evolve into "version 2.0," Levin continued, in which Israel is marketed to Diaspora Jews not as a schnorrer (a taker), but as a place that is open for business and in which investments in human capital can provide long-term, measurable results.

Dan Rahimi develops ROM's galleries

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Visitors who stream into Toronto's Royal Ontario Museum owe a debt of gratitude to Dan Rahimi.

As vice-president of gallery development at one of Canada's largest museums, he's in charge of planning new galleries and sprucing up existing ones.

Thanks to his expertise and good taste, a visit to the ROM becomes an experience to savour and remember.

"It's an incredible challenge," said Rahimi in a reference to his position.

An anthropologist and archeologist who has undertaken excavations in Israel and the Arab world, Rahimi, 59, started working at the ROM in 1987, when he curated the Treasures of the Holy Land exhibition, a trove of 280 outstanding pieces from the Israel Museum in Jerusalem.

More recently, he was project director of two exceptionally well-received exhibitions, the first on Israel's Dead Sea Scrolls and the second on China's terra cotta Warriors.

These days, Rahimi is busy setting the stage for new galleries on Rome, Byzantium, Nubia, modern design and early life on the planet, which are expected to open in the summer.

"It takes about two to three years to open a gallery," he said in an interview at his cluttered subterranean office. "It used to take seven years. We've streamlined our development process."

Developing a new gallery requires the services of more than 100 employees, of whom 20 to 25 are integral to the task.

When it comes to galleries, Rahimi plays no favourites. "Every gallery at the ROM interests me," he said. "I really do like each of them."

It may be surprising that only 50,000 objects, representing less than 10 per cent of the ROM's immense collection, can be exhibited at any given time. "Due to space limitations, great museums can display only a small portion of their holdings," he said. "Some objects are not worthy of display. They are here for research purposes only."

Several of the objects are truly priceless, being worth tens of millions of dollars each. For security and insurance reasons, Rahimi cannot identify them. But he has no problem singling out some of the ROM's rarest objects – the 300 meteorites in its collection.

On average, the ROM acquires some 1,000 objects a year through bequests or purchases. A $54-million endowment fund enables the museum to buy artifacts.

Rahimi's most successful exhibitions have been Dead Sea Scrolls: Words That Changed the World and The Warrior Emperor and China's Terracotta Army, each of which attracted in the order of 300,000 visitors.

He wasn't surprised that local Palestinian Arabs and their sympathizers objected to the Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit. "The political issues resolved themselves on the street through protests," he recalled.

Rahimi, a graduate of Union College, is an accidental anthropologist and archeologist. While completing an MA in philosophy at the University of Toronto, he worked on a dig – an Iron Age military outpost – in greater Jerusalem.

This experience led him to pursue a PhD degree in anthropology at the University of Pennsylvania. "I wanted to do something more physically active than philosophy," he said. "We all make mistakes in our youth."

Rahimi is a specialist in the neolithic period in the Middle East. Starting about 10,000 years ago, this was an era when people abandoned hunting and gathering and settled down as farmers.

The neolithic epoch, he explained, was perhaps the greatest game changer in the annals of human society.

"It led to the next great transformation, urbanization, which occurred partly because of population pressures. A lot of things came together to lead people to live closer together."

Rahimi has studied the seminal transition from hunting and gathering to agriculture at Mideast excavations since 1981. The first dig took him to Turkey. The second one brought him to the Ain Ghazal site in Amman, Jordan.

Dan Rahimi

"Most of my work has been in Jordan," said Rahimi. "Ain Ghazal was a very large neolithic village that basically went out of business. It thrived for about 1,000 years and ended."

At Ain Ghazal, Rahimi and his team made "an incredible discovery," finding 9,000-year-old plaster statues in the form of human beings. "No one knows who sculpted them. They were made before the invention of writing."

A specialist in neolithic stone tools, Rahimi has also excavated sites in Yemen. "I love working in Yemen, an extremely beautiful and archeologically unique country. Since we know so little about Yemen's archeology, we're always surprised by what we find there."

Rahimi has been the field director of Shengavit, an Early Bronze Age site in Armenia, since 2009. "It's a very early urban site," he explained. "We're trying to determine whether there were connections between ancient Armenia and Mesopotamia."

Born in Jerusalem, he's the son of Nissan and Elisheva Rahimi, both of whom settled in Palestine during the 1930s.

Elisheva, a German Jew, fled Nazism. Nissan, an Iranian Jew, hailed from the city of Meshad, where Jews were forced to convert to Islam in the 19th century.

Rahimi's father was outwardly a Muslim, a member of the Jadid el-Islam community. But in secret, he and his family practised Judaism. After arriving in Jerusalem, he shed his Muslim identity completely.

"There are no Jews in Meshad today," he noted, saying that all of them eventually emigrated.

Rahimi and his family left Israel when he was still a toddler. He grew up in New York City.

His wife, Julie Comay, is a teacher. They have two children: Samuel, a computer engineer who lives in San Francisco, and Hannah, a musician who works in Montreal.

Israeli movies featured at short film fest

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israel's oldest and largest film school, Tel Aviv University, has contributed several movies to this year's World Wide Short Film Festival in Toronto, which runs until June 5.

The films reviewed here will be screened on Thursday, June 2 from 4:15 p.m. onward at the Royal Ontario Museum.

Udi Ben-Arie's Second Watch is a whimsical allegory about the possibilities of peace in the Middle East.

Two soldiers, an Israeli and a Jordanian, face each other at remote border outposts several hundred metres apart. The Israeli is bored and has run out of water. "How are you?" he shouts in a spontaneous outburst, breaking the icy atmosphere.

Having doffed their shirts and dropped their rifles, they meet at the border fence. The Israeli tosses over a racy magazine. The Jordanian shares his water.

Interestingly enough, Second Watch was made in 1995, a year after Israel and Jordan signed a historic peace treaty. The high hopes it evoked is reflected in this modest and appealing film.

One From Afar, by Noa Osheroff, unfolds in a hospital room as a middle-aged woman readies herself psychologically for a traumatic surgical procedure, a double mastectomy.

She and her daughter, Dana, a professional clown, engage in chit chat, which masks the mother's anxieties.

Before she is whisked away into the operating room, the mother asks the daughter for a favour, which turns into a special and poignant moment.

Deep undercurrents run beneath this ostensibly simple film.

Roni Geffen's Transparent Black deals with the problems non-Jewish foreign workers face in Israel today. It takes place in an ulpan in southern Tel Aviv where Africans are trying to learn rudimentary Hebrew.

Koku, a man from Togo, is having trouble renewing his work permit. His empathetic Israeli teacher, Yair, claims that he is not wanted in Israel. This exchange segues into a scene in which the other students, all Africans, express their hopes about the future.

This gritty film underscores the difficulties that foreign workers experience in Israel, from learning basic Hebrew to extending work permits.

Silence, by Hadar Morag, focuses on the unusual friendship between a grown single man, Amnon, and a lonely school girl, Mashda.

One might assume that something ominous is lurking in the background, but perish the thought. Amnon, a night shift worker who loves eating cold watermelon at sunrise, enjoys the unfettered simplicity of Mashda's platonic company. No explanations are offered. A viewer must take this odd relationship at face value.

Udi Ben-Arie's Second Watch is an allegory set on Israel's border with Jordan.

When Mashda catches Amnon in a very private adult moment, she finally realizes, perhaps, that the generational divide cannot be bridged.

The subject of Lior Geller's Roads – set in Lod, a dilapidated and neglected Jewish-Arab town near Ben-Gurion Airport – is the illegal and dangerous drug trade.

Ismail, a sharp, nervy 13 year-old Arab teen, works as a runner for Ahmed, a drug lord who has ruthlessly killed competitors. When Ismail discovers that his younger brother, Riad, has become a member of Ahmed's gang, he reconsiders his place in the business.

Daniel, a Jewish veteran of the Second Lebanon War and a drug addict, is also thrown into the mix.

The gap between Arab and Jewish societies in Israel is the subtext of this brutally realistic film, which is punctuated by rhythmic Arab rap songs.

Actor ruminates about working on Shabbat

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

American actor Rachel Geisler has had to make a decision early in her career about whether she would work on Shabbat.

The New York University student took an eight-month absence from her studies this year to join the young cast of the North American tour of the musical Spring Awakening, which included stops last month in Ottawa, Kingston and Kitchener, Ont. Geisler starred as Anna, one of the lead roles in the musical.

Spring Awakening, which won eight Tony Awards in 2007, is a story of teens coming of age and trying to come to terms with their values in 19th-century Germany.

Brooklyn-born Geisler is coming of age and has also had to think seriously about her values. Raised in an Orthodox family, Geisler had to accept that she would be performing on Shabbat as part of her contract on tour.

"My family and I discussed the issue of performing on Shabbat, and I am fortunate that my family is loving and accepting that to grow as an actress, I had to make some changes. I continue to eat kosher and follow as much as I can while I continue to grow professionally," Geisler said.

"Being raised and wanting to be shomer Shabbat observant, I still consider myself a religious person. However, [if I want] to have a career in theatre, performing on Shabbat is going to be impossible to avoid, as not all of us have Dudu Fisher's star power."

Geisler is referring to Israeli actor Dudu Fisher, who became the first Orthodox Jewish actor to have in his contract a provision that he would not perform on Shabbat. Fisher had the lead role of Jean Valjean in Les Miserables and did not perform on Fridays or on Saturday matinees during the Broadway or London runs of the musical from 1993 to '95.

"I have to thank producer Cameron Mackintosh for agreeing to my terms, but it's not easy to do this," Fisher said. "I am not sure whether other Orthodox Jews who work in the performing arts can have these terms."

In 1966, Fisher performed in his one-man revue Never On Friday, which centred on the theme of not performing on Shabbat.

Friday nights and Saturday matinees are considered prime time for theatre, and for a producer to cancel performances on Shabbat is a loss of revenue. However, if the Orthodox performer is a marquee attraction, exceptions can be made.

Orthodox Jewish hip-hop singer Matisyahu performs internationally while remaining Shabbat observant as does Israeli actor Yisrael Campbell, who will star next year in Circumcise Me at the Harold Green Jewish Theatre.

"Having Yisrael Campbell being able to perform is worth the loss of revenue on Friday night and Saturday afternoons. Sales were robust and audiences respected that he chose not to perform on Shabbat," Larry Toppall, producer of Circumcise Me, said when the one-man musical was performed in Miami this year. Geisler realizes that not performing on Shabbat is the exception rather than the rule.

"Maybe if I have the star power one day, things may change. But I will go into my career knowing that it is likely that I will have to perform on the Shabbat and accept that."

They don't make Jews like Kinky anymore

David Silverberg
Special to The CJN

The original Texas Jewboy, as Kinky Friedman proclaims himself, doesn't mind being alone. For the better part of the past spring, Friedman has been touring solo in several states and Toronto, a far cry away from writing detective novels.

An author of more than 25 books and a country music star from the 1970s, Friedman relishes returning to his musical passion. Strumming the guitar and singing his classic They Don't Make Jews Like Jesus Anymore on a Toronto stage, say, evokes everything he missed about visiting new cities and being on the road.

"I had a winter of some discontent," Friedman says in an interview in the dressing room of the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts in Toronto. "I wanted to be a musician again, and this is a much higher calling than being a politician."

Friedman should know. Somewhat. The past several years has seen the country musician attempt to collar a political job, first vying for governor of Texas and later for Texas Agriculture Commissioner. He didn't win either position, despite his deep connections: Friedman counts former U.S. presidents Bill Clinton and George W. Bush as good friends.

The aspiring politico blames the two-party system for his electoral fizzle. "I should have never ran as a Democrat. In Texas, Democrats are viewed as weak," Friedman says. "If I ran in Minnesota, I could've been governor there." If there is a next time, he'll go Independent, he promises.

Politics clouded Friedman's life with paperwork and media calls, so he finds touring liberating. He performs songs he hasn't played regularly in years, but this time with no backing band. Going solo also gives him the flexibility to read from his out-of-print memoirs, Heroes of a Texas Childhood, which feature 23 stories about his experiences and influential mentors.

Sorry, fans, no new songs from the Kinkster, he admits. He tends to "rotate the crop" of songs he performs, while also peppering the set with quirky anecdotes. His cowboy twang and trademark ten-gallon hat distinguishes Friedman from other touring storytellers, but his sense of humour is unpredictable, perhaps even more so than his unique book titles: Kill Two Birds and Get Stoned; You Can Lead a Politician To Water, But You Can't Make Him Think.

Looking ahead, Friedman is working on a non-fiction book with actor Billy Bob Thornton, but he's mum on the details. He's also been narrating some of his detective novels into e-books, saying he recognizes where the publishing industry is heading. "My next book is going straight to e-book," he proclaims.

A celebrity author's book going straight to e-book? Really? Friedman waves away any mention of the c-word. "Celebrity? No, not me. I'm more like a folk hero, more Willie Nelson than Justin Bieber."

China's first graphic novel on the Holocaust

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Three years ago, the East China Normal University Press in Shanghai published a unique book, the first Chinese graphic novel on the Holocaust.

A Jewish Girl in Shanghai, by Wu Lin, turns on a Jewish family that flees Nazi persecution in Europe in the late 1930s and finds a haven in Shanghai.

On a broader level, Wu's novel is about the resettlement of Jews in this teeming, cosmopolitan port city, the only place not requiring Jewish refugees to obtain an entry visa.

Wu's lavishly illustrated novel, aimed at young adult readers, has been transformed into an animated movie by the directors Wang Genfa and Zhang Zhenui.

Last month, A Jewish Girl in Shanghai was presented at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Wu Lin

In an interview on the eve of its screening at the Al Green Theatre, Wu, the 60-year-old author, said he was compelled to write A Jewish Girl from Shanghai because the era it recreates is well worth remembering.

"China opened its doors to Jewish people, though Shanghai was densely populated and living conditions were difficult," he said, speaking in Mandarin through a local interpreter. "Nevertheless, Shanghai welcomed Jews."

One of China's great cities, Shanghai was occupied by the Japanese army in 1937. From that point onward, foreigners wishing to settle there did not need visas or passports.

About 20,000 Jews, particularly from Germany and Austria, poured into Shanghai, which had previously been settled by Sephardi Jews from Iraq and India and Ashkenazi Jews from the Russian Empire.

Japan, an ally of Germany, adopted a dual policy toward the newcomers. On the one hand, the Japanese resisted pressure from Germany to hand over the Jewish inhabitants. On the other hand, Japan, in 1943, forced Jews into the Hongkou neighbourhood, one of the poorest, most congested districts.

With the defeat of Japan in World War II, the rise of the People's Republic of China and the establishment of the State of Israel, the majority of Jews in Shanghai departed.

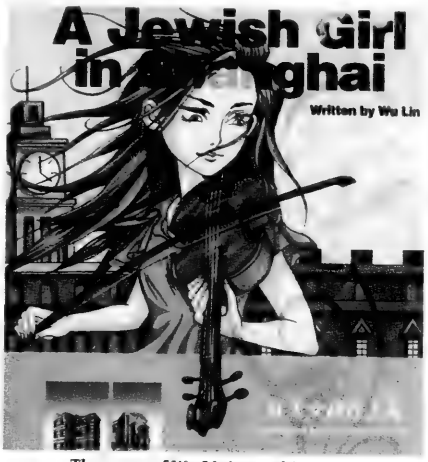
"Everyone in Shanghai today knows the story of the Jewish refugees in Shanghai," said Wu, a writer of historical novels.

A resident of Shanghai, he was a history teacher and businessman trading in gems and jewelry before he turned his talents to writing.

When he was only nine, he saw a subtitled foreign film about the Holocaust. The movie left a deep impact on him, but many more years elapsed before he learned that thousands of European Jews had flocked to Shanghai to escape persecution.

"The whole world knows what the Nazis did to the Jews," he said. "But I didn't discover Shanghai's relationship with Jews until the 1980s, when I lived in Hongkou."

Wu began writing his graphic novel on Shanghai's Jewish past after reading a newspaper article in 2005



The cover of Wu Lin's graphic novel

about its former Jewish residents. He supplemented his knowledge by research and through conversations with Israel's consul in Shanghai.

A Jewish Girl in Shanghai, which was published in English and Mandarin editions in 30,000 copies, is dedicated to the proposition that "benevolence and righteousness are the guide of one's soul."

It revolves around two Jewish children – Rena and her younger brother – who arrive in the city after the disappearance of their parents. Wu writes: "It was a mad world. Jewish people lived in terror. Rena's father fought against the Nazis. Her mother was taken away by the German Nazis. Rena and her little brother had to flee Europe and seek refuge in Shanghai."

The plot is straightforward.

On a chilly winter morning in Shanghai, Rena befriends a Chinese boy who sells pancakes. Their friendship grows amid tribulations and learning experiences. Wu portrays the Nazis as glowering bullies and the Japanese as brutal aggressors.

The novel has been translated into Hebrew and Wu hopes that an Israeli edition will be published soon. He has written a sequel, which is expected to be out in August.

It's clear that A Jewish Girl in Shanghai tapped into a receptive audience. With Jewish communities having existed in Shanghai, Harbin and Kaifeng, and with 10 Chinese universities having set up programs in Jewish studies, interest in Jewish themes appears to be blossoming in China.

Wu, the scriptwriter of the film, said it was very difficult adapting the book to the screen in terms of integrating characters and music into the fabric of the narrative.

"The movie moves at a faster pace than the novel," he said.

Though the film version has yet to be released commercially in China, A Jewish Girl in Shanghai has been seen by about 100,000 viewers at more than 30 festivals in Israel, Europe and the United States. He was especially pleased by the positive feedback from the the Jerusalem Film Festival.

Speaking positively about Jewish-Chinese historical relations, he trusts that the novel and the film will leave readers and viewers alike with one unambiguous message: mutual tolerance and understanding are of the utmost importance in a world riven by conflict and disharmony.

Maccabi finishes indoor soccer season with two trophies

Compiled by CJN Staff

Maccabi Toronto's men's indoor soccer team captured two of four indoor trophies in what was to be a rebuilding year.

During the winter season in the Downsview Park Adult Soccer League, the team went undefeated with 11 wins and one tie en route to a league cup. Their luck ran out in the championship game, when they they lost 4-3 in the finals to Spartak after having beaten their rivals twice in the regular season.

Earlier during the fall season, second-place Maccabi defeated Armour Elite – the Ontario Soccer League under-21 champions – in a thrilling 4-3 final, capturing the Downsview Park Adult Soccer League Championship, the first of their two cups.

Maccabi's Gil Vainshtein led the league in scoring over the course of the two sessions. Veteran player and coach Jason Mausberg finished fourth during the winter session and netted the winning goal in the semifinals and added another in the final.

In the winter session alone, Vainshtein potted 13 goals in 11 games, behind only league leader Nikou Abdouliaev of Mushrooms United. Mausberg had nine goals in 10 games while Alon Badat had eight goals in 10 games, tying for fifth in scoring.

Other Maccabi players to figure among league-leading scorers were Alex Razimor (seven goals) and Dan Sankar (four).

The team's on-field success came in what prognosticators forecast would be a down year. Maccabi went into the fall season having lost Tomer Chenchinski, a former Toronto FC player, who left to play Division 1 soccer in Finland. In addition, goal-scoring sensation Tzion Cohen returned to play in Israel.

"This was to be a rebuilding year," said Mausberg.

Toronto Maccabi has been dominant, he pointed out, capturing eight out of the last 10 regular season and playoff championship trophies in the Downsview League at the Toronto Hangar – one of the elite indoor soccer leagues in Ontario.

Mausberg is optimistic about the crop of new Jewish players who have joined and will be joining the team. Collegiate all-stars Ilya Orlov and Alon Badat, members of the York University Lions 2010 national championship team, played when available this past season. Orlov has been selected to represent Canada in men's soccer at the 26th Summer Universiade in Shenzhen, China, this August.

Razimor joined the team after winning the soccer MVP award last fall at the University of Ontario Institute of Technology (UOIT).

This summer, Maccabi will be playing in the 80-team Toronto Services Soccer League (TSSL) in the Premier division. The league schedule better accommodates the college players' schedules and doesn't require the same full-time commitment for players with jobs.

New additions include Dan Frankel, who was the starting centre midfielder for University of Western Ontario Mustangs, and Brad Rose, a starting striker at Yale University.

"The quality and credentials of Toronto Jewish players competing at the collegiate level in Canada and the United States in the last five years has risen dramatically and will continue to ensure that Maccabi Toronto continues their dominance in the Toronto and Ontario soccer scene," Mausberg said.

PERFECT SEASON: The Bialik senior girls basketball team ended a perfect 11-0 season in the Jewish Day School Sports League with a last-second 27-25 win against the Associated Hurricanes at Hoopdome. This was the first time that Bialik's boys and the girls senior basketball teams took championship titles in the same year. Pictured with the senior girls basketball team, far right, is head coach Alexandra Baker and assistant coach Alyssa Catzman. At left is Marcus Dickler, Bialik's athletics co-ordinator and assistant coach.

Gaza flotilla plans to proceed

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Pro-Palestinian activists told Israel on Monday not to interfere with an aid flotilla to Gaza planned for late June, a little more than a year after Israeli commandos boarded an aid ship, killing eight Turks and one Turkish-American.

Holding a news conference on the deck of the Mavi Marmara, where the May 31, 2010, confrontation occurred, a coalition of 22 activist groups called on governments to ensure there is no repeat of the incident.

The activists held a minute's silence for those who were killed in 2010.

UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon has asked governments to discourage activists from sending a new convoy, and Turkey has told them of the risks of trying to break Israel's naval blockade of Gaza.

Gaza is controlled by Hamas, which calls for the destruction of Israel, and the group is regarded as terrorist by western powers, including the United States and the European Union.

Israel says it blockades Gaza to stop the importation of weapons.

Ban Ki-moon

"They will not attack. We don't believe they will repeat the same big mistake against humanity," said Huseyin Oruc, a spokesman for the Istanbul-based Foundation for Human Rights and Freedoms and Humanitarian Relief (IHH), an Islamic charity group that was formed to provide aid to Bosnian Muslims in the mid-1990s.

"It is the Mavi Marmara, it is a peace boat and the other 14 boats are also peace boats," Oruc told the news conference on the ship, which overlooked the Golden Horn inlet in Istanbul, as workmen carried out maintenance work on the decks below.

In an interview with Reuters on Monday, Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu said the onus is on Israel to avoid any repeat of the bloodshed, adding it should abandon its illegal blockade of 1.5 million Palestinians living in the enclave.

"We are sending a clear message to all those concerned. The same tragedy should not be repeated," he said.

Turkey wants Israel to apologize for its actions on the Mavi Marmara and to compensate the families of the men shot dead.

They were shot after the first Israeli boarding party on the ship was attacked by activists wielding metal bars, clubs and knives. The incident led to a breakdown in already strained ties between Turkey and Israel.

The activists said the new flotilla would have 15 ships, including the Mavi Marmara, and would carry 1,500 people from some 100 countries, as well as humanitarian aid and construction materials.

Egypt eased travel restrictions for Gaza residents on Saturday, opening the Rafah crossing and eroding the blockade.

But a spokesman for the "Gaza Freedom Flotilla II" vowed to keep challenging it.

"Israel's unlawful blockade remains in effect. Israel still prevents Palestinians from using their sea, and controls and severely restricts all goods entering and exiting Gaza," said Greek university professor Vangelis Pissias.

"We renew our call to our governments to do their utmost to ensure that Israel does not repeat its attack on us," he said.

The United Nations has said it is giving a panel set up to investigate last year's incident more time to finish its work.

In letters to Mediterranean governments, Ban said aid for Gaza should go through "legitimate crossings and established channels" – which in practice means through Israel – and said he was concerned by reports of a new flotilla.

Activists say it is legal for them to send goods by sea direct to the coastal Gaza Strip.

Kavanah Garden entwines Judaism with environmentalism

Rachel Miller
Special to The CJN

It is said that the world stands on three pillars: on Torah, on service and on acts of human kindness.

Shoresh Jewish Environmental Programs is rooted in the social and environmental values found in these pillars.

Founded in 2002, Shoresh, which until last year was called the Jewish Nature Centre of Canada, aims to teach people to build a more ecologically sustainable community through the lens of Judaism.

For Risa Cooper, Shoresh's executive director who founded the Kavanah Garden in 2009, the organization offers Toronto's Jewish community a way to entwine their environmental, ecological and Jewish identities.

"My motivation behind establishing Shoresh's Kavanah Garden was to give Toronto's Jewish community members an opportunity to engage with their Jewish identity in real, meaningful and hands-on ways," said Cooper, who was named the 2010 Woman to Watch by Presentense magazine.

The Kavanah Garden is an organic educational garden at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Ont., that features more than 100 varieties of vegetables, herbs, fruit, and wildflowers, a havdalah spice garden, a greenhouse, a solar oven, a nature trail, and a rainwater catchment system.

The garden is open to elementary-school field trips as well as adult workshops that promote the connection between Torah and agriculture.

Cooper, who is a vegan, said she first became interested in gardening while she was a bachelor's student at Queen's University.

"I spent a summer in Costa Rica and during that time spent a few weeks volunteering in a village that had a raw goat dairy and grew all of their own fresh fruit and vegetables," she said.

Kavanah Garden farmers built a Magen David-shaped raised wildflower bed. The raised bed will attract pollinators and other beneficial insects to the garden.

But it was the Teva Learning Center, a Jewish outdoor education centre in Connecticut, that led her down a path of Jewish environmentalism.

Cooper was pursuing her master's in contemporary Jewish environmental discourse at the University of Toronto when she first learned about Teva in 2005.

"I went for six weeks to do field research for my thesis and ended up falling so in love with the community and their model of experiential education that after completing my thesis, I returned to Teva where I worked as a Jewish environmental educator and then their wilderness programs coordinator for five seasons," she said.

Having just celebrated her third year with Shoresh, Cooper promotes the Kavanah Garden through programs that send Shoresh representatives to schools and synagogues to run workshops.

The interactive workshops show participants how to apply green living into their everyday lives.

Cooper said that the message resonates with some of the young students who visit the garden.

She recalled a special moment when a group of children visited the garden last year and found a praying mantis.

Cooper said they were amazed to see such an incredible creature. Sensing a teaching moment, she explained that there is a prayer that can be said when you see something rare or beautiful.

"One of the children said, 'There is a blessing for when we see a really cool bug – I love being Jewish,'" Cooper recalled.

In addition to fostering an appreciation of Judaism's connection with the environment, the Kavanah Garden also implements the laws in the Torah that dictate how food should be grown and harvested. Although farmers outside of Israel aren't obligated to follow these laws, Cooper said the Kavanah gardeners do.

Shoresh also promotes the importance of tzedakah and tikkun olam.

About 80 per cent of all the produce grown is donated to people in need through Ve'ahavta, a Toronto-based humanitarian organization. The Kavanah Garden provides families in need with wholesome organic produce that they would not otherwise be able to afford.

For the past two years, Shoresh has provided hundreds of kilograms of food for tzedakah, while Shoresh staff have been working towards increasing programming and making the programs more accessible.

They've succeeded in attracting more than 3,000 people to participate in some aspects of Shoresh.

In May, Shoresh hosted its first forum at Beth Tzedec Synagogue that brought Jews of every denomination to celebrate the successes of the Jewish food movement in the Greater Toronto Area and map out steps to move forward.

"Seeing how the Kavanah Garden has grown in just two short seasons has been hugely humbling," Cooper said.

"I am so grateful for the incredible show of support we have received from community members from all across the many spectrums that make up our community."

Shoresh's executive director Risa Cooper, bottom right, invited senior kindergarten Leo Baeck students to help harvest the Atomic Red Carrots they planted as junior kindergarten students the previous spring.

"אה, והכי חשוב: להתמקח!" אני מזכירה לכולם. "אני לא מוציאה יותר מעשרה דולר על כל הסיבוב."

APOLOGY

Last week we published a photo purporting to be of Michael Gordon. But it was not. We apologize.

Who's reading the Urban Writer anyway?

Over the years, readers have written me with their responses to this column Sometimes they are complimentary and other times not. Either way, thanks for taking the time to e-mail me. I am grateful for the opportunity to write for The CJN, and to get your feedback.

One reader wrote: "Avrum, I have been reading your column in The CJN since the beginning. It never fails to bring forth an emotional response – sometimes, melancholy, sometimes happiness, sometimes shame and regret and sometimes determination to do better."

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

A response to my article about my agoraphobia: "I'm sending you this e-mail because I also suffer from anxiety-related phobias and panic. I have other phobias – elevators, highway driving, subways, tunnels, claustrophobia, and I am hoping to overcome them."

On a chassidic child calling me a gonif: "As a nation, we seem to have a high intolerance of each others differences. I often think HaShem is looking down on us and either laughing or crying because of how we act toward our fellow Jew."

From a Montrealer following an article critiquing the Toronto Jewish community: "Toronto is what it is; believing you are a world-class city doesn't make it true. It just means you are delusional. You can, as the Yiddish saying goes, talk yourself into anything, and Toronto's nouveau riche Jews, hangers-on and wannabes have done just that."

On Diaspora Jews and antisemitism: "I am delighted... that finally someone shares my concern about how passive Jews in the Diaspora are sometimes."

Another person wrote: "I was disappointed with your last column. Many felt let down by your allegation that Jews are basically cowards in Toronto, hiding in their synagogues afraid to brave the streets in support of their brothers and sisters in Israel (during the war on Gaza). I believe you are wrong, very wrong."

A local rabbi wrote me following my article on his "quiet" colleagues: I look at the Jewish world as a whole and see hemorrhaging in all directions... I would raise my voice against building mausoleums of Jewish sport, of the unwillingness of our world to go deep into its Jewish soul, of the massive North American tragedy of patrilineal descent, as well as non-traditional conversions and gittin (divorces) that will rupture the Jewish world."

Following an article about missing and loving our kids: "Many years ago, when I brought my daughter home from camp, we clung to each other for days. I remember standing with her at a store counter with my arm around her, and a passerby commented, 'You really like each other don't you?'"

Another reader wrote: "I have two wonderful boys, and I always make a point of telling them how much I love them, for no special reason. In return, they often do the same. So go tell your son you love him, just like your father loved you, I am sure."

Following my article on Ponzi schemer Bernie Madoff and how we should feel shame because he is Jewish: "The role of a communicator is to bring people together. Your column has created divisions of us and them."

Some general responses to my articles: "I find your comments offensive... well worth the wait... really shocked by your column where you question Jewish day school for Noah. I thought you were smarter than that. I was celebrating with you when you had a child and prayed for you when you were not well."

A bar mitzvah in Israel

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Many of us consider having our child's bar mitzvah in Israel or holding that special family celebration far from our home shores.

Sometimes the logistics of planning such an event seem overwhelming and the idea stops before it can reach fruition. For those who execute the plan, though, their event can be imbued with meaning, spirituality and a level of fun they would never have had in their own backyard.

If you're considering travelling to Israel with a group of 10 or more for your event, make sure you book your tickets as a group, rather than as individual travellers, says Dinah Kutner, El Al's general manager for Canada. "That guarantees you a certain fare well in advance," she explains. Groups who have had their passports pre-screened by El Al can expedite their security checks. And if the airline knows there's a group celebrating a special event on board, they make sure congratulatory announcements are included. Starting this fall, El Al will be announcing an agreement with WestJet Airlines throughout Canada.

For Kutner and her staff, parties are a big part of El Al's business. "People have found that you can get a lot of value for your money in Israel," she muses. "They've put on beautiful affairs at different venues and get a lot more value than they would locally. Plus the emotional component of having a bar mitzvah or wedding at the Wall is an amazing, meaningful experience. And the weather always lends itself to beautiful outdoor parties."

As summer finally approaches, bookings to Israel are increasing in number, says Michelle Shenkar, office manager at PayLess Travel (416-922-0116). "For bar mitzvahs, I'll organize the flight, the bus, the rabbi and a tour," she says. "I can also arrange a brunch for guests or a celebration dinner."

The company specializes in planning bar/bat mitzvahs or weddings in Israel and elsewhere. Shenkar says she is currently organizing destination weddings in Jamaica and Barbados, booking the flights, the rooms and the marriage commissioner. In the past, she has even arranged for a rabbi to officiate at a wedding in Aruba.

"We help couples to find the right venue, whether it be on the beach as the sun melts into the sea or in a modern venue," Shenkar said. "And we're a full-service agency, which means we'll plan your event right down to the car, the flowers, the cake and more, based on what you want."

The trip list at PayLess Travel varies according to the time of year. Summer usually means family tours, while in fall and winter there are more bar mitzvahs, group tours and Israelis flying home to see their family.

Entertainers add to the fun

Laura Fixman
Intern

Anyone who's planning a party wants to make sure the guests enjoy themselves, and an entertainer can certainly help.

Doo Doo the clown (905-761-0010, www.farcoentertainment.com) has been in the business for 28 years, and any party where he is the headliner will be memorable.

Doo Doo has been on the Treehouse TV show Daniel Cook, and he has been asked to perform at the Canadian National Exhibition for 22 years. He also travels about 175 days a year and is preparing for an upcoming trip as the featured performer at the Calgary Stampede in July. He enjoys his job, but most of all, he likes to make audiences happy at family parties.

"I'm grateful for every minute in this business," he said. "I love to watch the reactions of the families."

While he is generally booked for parties about a year in advance, he said people can call for last-minute bookings if he's in town. He promised that anyone who sees him at a party will have a great time.

"It's an hour of total fun," Doo Doo said. "There's a mixture of balloon animals, magic and comedy."

At the end of his shows, he likes to stay and pose for photos with the guests. He also likes to make sure that his act never gets old, even after many years in the business.

"We have to constantly keep up with what's going on with kids in the world," he said.

His company, Farco Entertainment, also offers other performers including magicians, jugglers, singers and more clowns. So, if Doo Doo is not available, Farco can still bring a smile to your guests' faces.

For a lasting keepsake of a simchah, caricature artist Mark Ciale (416-929-6678, www.markciale.com) offers entertainment of a different kind.

After studying at the Ontario College of Art and Design, Ciale began doing caricatures at Ontario Place, and he loved it so much that he never stopped.

"It was easy for me, and fun, too," Ciale said.

While he was working at Ontario Place, people started asking him to come to their parties to draw caricatures of them and their guests. He likes that it gives them a lasting way to remember the party.

"It's a fun souvenir," Ciale said. "Long after the lootbag stuff is gone, people still have it."

He works on 8- by 11-inch paper, and tries to draw a caricature of everyone at the party. He has also done storyboard work for television and does editorial cartoons for several publications.

Ciale enjoys a variety of themes and venues in which to showcase his talents. On his website, he promises to brighten up any event, tradeshow, party or simchah.

For him, the best part is making people smile. "I love the reaction of people when they're really happy with what I've given them," Ciale said.

Along with caricatures of party guests, Ciale also does caricatures of celebrities including Oprah, George Clooney and Britney Spears, which can be seen on his website.

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

Leading up to the simchah, it's all about the event at hand. But once that's taken care of, it becomes about how you look.

For Zeligson Photography and Adrian Holmes Photography, their purpose is ultimately that – to ensure that everyone comes off looking great.

"We're always looking for new ways to make our clients look good in their photos," Larry Zeligson said. "We always want to offer a great service with a good product."

The process begins well in advance of the event.

"They call me and ask to set up a meeting, and we'll meet," Holmes said. "Sometimes, the clients will ask for rates to be sent to them prior to our meeting, but it's a pretty simple process."

The photographers use their experience to pick out certain packages, but they'll listen to what their clients are looking for, too.

"I will generally recommend certain groupings of family members that I usually do, but I will also give the clients an opportunity to make suggestions," Zeligson said.

"I'm pretty open to whatever the client wants in terms of their ideas, and I'll offer my own suggestions about what looks good."

The separate pictures won't look alike, if the photographer has anything to do with it.

"I try to avoid using the same background all the time, so that I can give the client a lot of choice when it comes to choosing their photos," Zeligson said.

While there is always the attempt at the "money" shot, a true photographer wants to achieve far more than just that.

"A good photographer should not be looking for that 'one good shot,'" Holmes said. "A good photographer should, through their knowledge of their craft, strive for perfection in each image taken."

Of course, if the subjects aren't comfortable, it won't make a difference.

"I just try to make them relax as much as possible by making it not feel like a job," said Holmes, who also shoots fine art photography in his spare time. "It's supposed to be a fun time.

"I get to know them a bit, joke around a little with them and make them at ease."

With technology continuing to improve, there are increasingly more options and methods available to be tried out, and naturally, professional photographers will look at adding them to their arsenal.

"There are always new products out there," Zeligson said. "We try and input our new ideas on how we take or print the pictures, so we're always looking for new ways to design albums or techniques to take the photos.

"Our industry keeps changing and we're always looking for new ways to bring the changes to the clients."

Ultimately, it's a part of their business.

"It's up to photographers to push the envelope and master their craft," Holmes said. "[It] widens the gap between the educated amateur photographer and the seasoned pro."

For those professional photographers, it's their way of realizing their vision artistically.

"It's special when I can picture a scene in my mind and reproduce it," Holmes said.

"To see the reaction of my clients when they see the images makes it all worth it."

Zeligson Photography can be reached at 416-638-3026 or on the web at www.zeligsonphotography.com.

Adrian Holmes Photography can be booked online at www.holmesphoto.com or by phone at 416-356-1749.

Some fresh ideas for kids party venues

Megan Haynes
Special to The CJN

Talk about a birthday to remember: at Kids Fun City, children can star in their own cartoon. Animalive works like this: kids pick a character, then they interact with it while it plays on screen.

The characters, from rabbits, to raccoons to monkeys and more, play games, tell stories and can carry on a conversation with the kids – all through the TV screen.

Pin the tail on the donkey is so low-tech in comparison.

Animalive is the main attraction at the newly opened Kids Fun City, says Amy-Alynn Gnidec, director of guest services.

"We want kids to stay engaged, stay involved," she says.

Located at 150 Lesmill Rd., Kids Fun City (416-444-4386, www.kidsfuncity.ca) offers drop-in rates and pre-planned rentals, as well as party packages. Everything can be customized, Gnidec says.

Apart from Animalive, Kids Fun City has a two-lane bowling alley, a laser obstacle course, traditional playgrounds and parent friendly zones (fully equipped with Wi-Fi.)

"We want to cater to the parents, too," she says.

Further south, in downtown Toronto, there's another option for events.

While the Distillery District might not seem like the traditional location to host a kids party or bat or bar mitzvah, Matthew Rosenblatt, marketing and media manager, says events for kids and teens are becoming more frequent.

"I think it [the location] appeals more to the parents," he says. "It's a cool, sophisticated setting, and the mothers love it."

Children, he adds, can have fun anywhere, and the Distillery District (www.distilleryevents.com) offers a number of locations with different capacities that can appeal to parents planning events for the young ones.

The "cool," and "rough and tumble" atmosphere of the Distillery District is the biggest draw.

"People want to feel that their event is unique," he says.

Speaking of different, in its 16th year of business, the Whimz Live Animal program (416-656-7894, whimzonline.com) markets its own singular approach to children's parties.

Kids Fun City

As the only party program of its type in the GTA, Whimz brings in live animals to any location to interact with the children – creating a hands-on and educational program. The animals are brought out one at a time and the children can touch, play and learn about the critters. Whimz has a wide range of animals, including chinchillas, snakes and rabbits.

"Because these animals have been around people their whole life, they have no fear of us anymore," says Whimz manager Tracey Guerin. For example, "our chinchillas sit on the guest of honour's heads. We call it an extra special party hat."

Bellvue Manor: the perfect venue for your simchah

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

One of the first decisions a party planner needs to make is deciding where to hold their special event. Everyone wants to impress their guests, so choosing the perfect venue is critical.

Bellvue Manor, 905-761-7288, a banquet hall that opened in September 2007, is a popular choice that has received many positive reviews.

Located in Vaughan at 8083 Jane St., two lights north of Highway 7, Bellvue Manor has four event spaces that can be set up in nine different variations. There are options for events up to about 800 people.

Each room has pre-installed, state-of-the art technical amenities. The entertainment system operates flawlessly, because it's new technology and very user friendly. There are screens that are hidden in the architectural structure and come down from the ceiling if guests want to show a video or slide show. "We have an in-house audio visual company that can provide music, or else clients are welcome to bring in their own DJs or bands," said one of Bellvue Manor's sales managers.

BELLVUE MANOR

- √ Kosher
- √ Wheelchair Accessible
- √ 800 Person Capacity

One of the big draws of Bellvue Manor is its Grand Foyer, which is ideal for cocktail receptions. With its Italian crema marble and cast limestone walls, custom paintings and oversized French mahogany doors, it creates a sophisticated atmosphere and sets the mood for any event. It's perfect for Jewish weddings, which often have a cocktail hour between the ceremony and dinner. The sales manager noted that the owner actually had Jewish weddings in mind when the building was being designed.

Another attraction of Bellvue Manor is the food. There is a COR-certified kosher kitchen on site and an in-house chef to help clients plan their menus.

"Every event has a different menu, because no set menu can meet the needs of every party," explained the sales manager. "The chef has to be versatile, because every client has their own idea of the meal they want to serve their guests."

The most popular dishes are continental cuisine, food with a European flavour, with dishes ranging from sea bass to fine cuts of beef. There are also a number of vegetarian options.

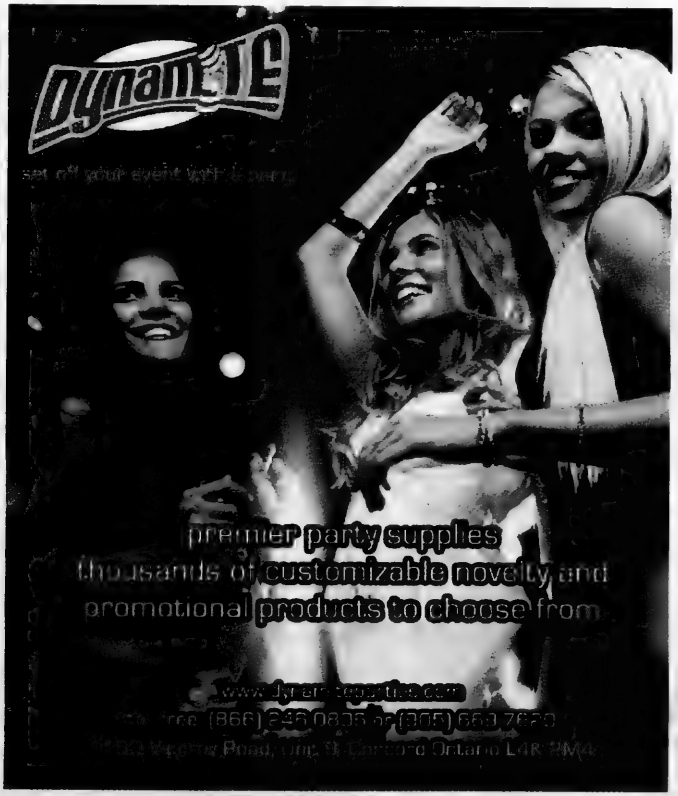
Typically, an event will consist of a cocktail hour with passed hors d'oeuvres, three to five courses for the main meal, and a late night sweet or savoury table. The sweet table can be anything from cakes, to chocolate fountains and crepes, and fruit is always a staple. Some clients choose a less traditional post-dinner treat and have hot dog stands, or serve pizza or poutine.

Bellvue Manor stands apart from other banquet halls due to the level of experience of the managers and owner.

"We've all been in the business for over 20 years, so we've seen everything and know what we're doing," says the sales manager.

From the moment a client books their event at Bellvue Manor, a sales team is involved and helps with every detail until the last guest leaves on the night of the event.

"Anytime there is a change in the event, the entire team is aware, so we never have any miscommunication. We want everything to go exactly as you planned it, and if for some reason it doesn't, we make sure none of the guests realize."



Every party needs good music

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

A band is a key ingredient to any event, providing guests with the visual and audio entertainment that sets the mood and brings the party to life

Ambiance Flute & Guitar Duo (www.ambiancemusic.com 416-693-8778) has been performing for 25 years. "We've been playing together longer than the length of the average marriage," says Doriann Forrester, the band's flutist, who adds that she and guitarist/composer Philip Disera are not married to each other.

"We owe our longevity to changing with the musical times, yet playing music that has stood the test of time."

Forrester and Disera play instruments and sing. They specialize in "quality background music," but also have "cocktail dance repertoire, often with the addition of the upright bass. It's less frenetic than a full band. Plus, of course, we do horas," Forrester says.

The band plays music of more than five centuries, "from classical to jazz, Latin to swing, the Beatles, Van Morrison and Pearl Jam to music from around the globe. Over 2,500 songs."

Forrester, who has performed in musicals, television commercials and with various orchestras in Toronto, says Ambiance plays at all sorts of events. The duo has delighted crowds at wedding ceremonies and receptions, bar and bat mitzvahs, luncheons, cocktail and dinner parties, and corporate functions.

"We've played intimate dinner parties for two, played on a balcony during a marriage proposal, at large shuls, banquet halls, on boats, barns, galleries, hotels, ballrooms, in fields, on docks... but never underwater – although we have been rained on a few times!"

The band's most popular song requests depend on the type of event and musical taste and background of the client, Forrester said. "For wedding ceremonies, Erev Shelshoshonim, Canon by Pachelbel and Chorshat Ha Ekaliptus are very popular."

For receptions, luncheons and dinners, other timeless melodies include What a Wonderful World, All You Need Is Love and Blackbird.

"In Canada, we often perform for audiences from around the world. With the return of the popularity of the ukulele, Phil has even played uke by special request, especially Over the Rainbow."

Ambiance's fee depends on the particulars of the event, Forrester says. "Location, number of guests, musical requests and room moves [determine the cost]. We start at a $450 minimum for wedding ceremonies and all events are custom quoted to their own particular requirements."

Forrester says Ambiance is unique because the duo has a strong musical connection. "To be able to share our music with other people on very important days in their lives is a tremendous honour, and one we don't ever take for granted. We bring that emotion to every event and really enjoy being a part of people's simchahs."

Forrester says live music is an "important addition" to any event. "Music is very powerful for evoking memories and emotions. For this reason, every party needs good music, for different ages, volume levels and backgrounds, often at the same event."

What makes Ambiance unique is "our ability to read our listeners and be able to play the right music," says Forrester. Our overall musicianship, attention to detail and love for what we do comes out of our musical instruments. We perform music that makes a difference."

Joe Star Band

The Joe Star Band (905-881-1378 or 416-826-6661) has been wowing crowds for 22 years with drums, keyboard, saxophone, trumpet, bass guitar, lead guitar and two vocalist male and female singers.

"At most times, we have assembled an eight to 10 piece band," says Joe Star, a musician and performer who takes pride in providing "exceptional personal service and flexibility" by working closely with his clients.

The band specializes in live entertainment for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, corporate events, fundraisers, cocktail parties and birthdays. Each member brings experience, talent, personality and a love of music to the band, says Star.

"We can deliver a very current repertoire and can change our style of music immediately, from classic pop music to big band hits, classic rock 'n' roll, R&B, funk, Latin music and easy-listening jazz, adding the great ballroom dancing hits to keep your guests and audience in a dancing frenzy."

Star says his band "reads the dance crowd very well" and tailors the dance repertoire to the audience's musical preferences. "The choices are vast. The lively music, for which the band is known, is a big hit with the young and young at heart. We will turn a conventional party into an exceptional one."

The Joe Star Band can also set the size of band to suit any budget. "We can still deliver an optimum professional live band at any event from as low as three members down to a solo musician, all pending on the type of entertainment required for your special event."

Star says the price of his band depends on the customer's live entertainment requests. "The fee is based on the length of time and other additions such as enhanced lighting systems, smoke machines, spotlights, cocktails and ceremonies."

Star says almost all events his band performs at "are favourites because we always deliver a quality product. It is very gratifying to us when the client is content that we delivered such great live entertainment to their event."

If a client wishes to see a performance before booking the band, they can make arrangements with Star to visit a convenient scheduled function. "This will allow the client to feel reassured of the calibre and quality of our performance."

Star is confident that customers will be impressed with his band, which has performed at more than 2,500 events across North America. "The energy of this group is so magnetic, you can't help but be drawn to the dance floor!"

All kinds of shoes

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Corinne Lissoos still remembers in vivid detail an extra long car trip to Eilat during a vacation in Israel. She and her three children had to endure an unplanned detour as her husband searched for a shoe store that sold Naot sandals.

"He was addicted to those shoes," recalls Lissoos, president of Solemates Inc., the company that distributes Naot Footwear in Canada.

This Israeli line of shoes, which is designed and manufactured on Kibbutz Naot Mordechai near Kiryat Shmonah, is the most popular brand of shoe in that country, says Lissoos.

Naots have also grown in popularity in Canada since 1990, when she and a former partner first introduced them. Solemates has six Canadian corporate stores that sell only Naot shoes. The three in the Toronto area are: Prairie Dog, 960 Eglinton Ave W.; Naot Footwear, 1102 Centre St.; Naot on Leslie, 5891 Leslie St.

The shoes are also sold in 400 outlets across Canada and can be found at such stores as Capezio, Browns and Walking on a Cloud.

Lissoos calls wearing Naot shoes "going to Naot heaven," because the footwear is so comfortable. The signature foot-bed or inner sole, which is made from multiple layers of ergonomically designed materials, is based on the concept of a footprint in the sand, she explains. "The sand fills in the spaces moulding to your foot's contour. Literally every step you take will be cushioned."

She says this anatomical foot-bed is in every shoe. The foot-bed can be removed in 80 per cent of the line to accommodate orthotics, which is why podiatrists and other foot specialists recommend the shoe. "You can look nice, but you can also have the support of the orthotics that a podiatrist prescribes."

The foot-beds are also sold separately and are replaceable, she adds. "It's like getting a whole new shoe."

She says that initially Naot shoes were available only as sandals, but now they come in a wide variety of shoes and boots, and the sandals also became more stylish and sophisticated. "We have a platform sandal that's quite dressy and a new pump that is also orthotic friendly."

In addition to style and comfort, Naot is also known for its "vibrant colour and beautiful leather.

The leather comes from Italy."

Lissoos says Naots can be worn for dressy occasions. Her daughter, Natasha, the general manager of Solemates, will be wearing metallic leather Flirts, the platform style of Naots, to Lissoos' granddaughter's upcoming bat mitzvah.

Lissoos is choosing the black patent leather pumps for the simchah, she says. "Naots are for the woman who wants to look good and be comfortable. She is self-confident.

"The Naot saying is, 'You're most beautiful when you're comfortable.'"

That saying is also echoed by Carma Saunderson owner of Celebration Shoes, a boutique specializing in cloth shoes for special occasions. Saunderson says, "If you're uncomfortable in your shoes, it will show on your face."

Celebration Shoes, at 106 Yorkville Ave. in Toronto, sells cloth shoes that can be dyed to match other fabrics. "We do a lot of bridal work. Most bridal shoes are fabric. A leather shoe with a bridal gown is a harsh look."

Saunderson says after the wedding, bridal shoes can be dyed a darker colour. She does not recommend dyeing shoes for a wedding, especially if the bride is wearing a long dress, because if she stands on the grass, the shoes could soak up moisture and change colour, or possibly stain the hem of the dress.

The shoes, which range in price from $220 to $425, come in a variety of styles. "We have a whole collection from flats to high heels. We have 4.5-inch shoes for the brave bride. Only a small percentage buy fashion shoes. They're wearing them for eight hours so they've got to be comfortable."

Most of the Celebration Shoes are imported from England and Italy, says Saunderson. "I try to find unusual shoes. I search a lot."

A popular company is Paradox of London, which has three lines: Benjamin Adams and Belle and Pink. Benjamin Adams and Belle are "higher end," with pure silk uppers and they are lined in leather.

The Pink line, which is "more affordable," is satin.

"It's soft and pliable. There's not a lot of structure."

Another English line, she imports is Rachel Simpson of London. "They are vintage inspired. They are very different. They're for the discerning bride."

These come in suede and so they cannot be dyed. "They suit a short dress. In Europe, the girls are wearing short wedding dresses so the shoe is very important."

She says the line Something Bleu has a blue Swarovski crystal embedded in the sole. "We're really excited about these shoes. They're made in Italy. They're true craftsmanship."

Saunderson can also embellish the shoes with sequins and customized clips. "We do beautiful clips."

She also makes fabric flowers, which can be worn in the bride's hair or sewn onto the dress or the shoes.

She got into the cloth-shoe business, because she loved sewing clothes. She wanted to create fantasy shoes to match some of her creative clothing designs. "I thought it would be great to have fabric shoes," she says.

"A lot women have shoes they love. I thought if I could bring in simple shoes, I could dye them and add a feather or lace clip."

But her fabric shoes also became very popular for bridal wear.

Saunderson also custom dyes for bridesmaids and to go with formal wear for other special occasions and galas.

She says Celebration Shoes is on fashion maven Jeanne Beker's list of favourite shoe shops.

No deep fryers in Rose Reisman's kitchen

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

It's a sunny Friday afternoon in May and Ruth Reisman, matriarch of the Reisman clan, is getting ready for Friday night dinner.

This evening, the 80-something businesswoman is hosting 29 members of her family. But you won't find her slaving in the kitchen.

She has ordered a sumptuous dinner that includes a large roast turkey, rack of lamb, couscous, steamed bok choy and green salads, to name just a few of dishes that have arrived from her favourite caterer – Rose Reisman Catering (416-467-7758, www.rosereismancatering.com).

No surprise there. Ruth and Rose Reisman are mother-and daughter-in-law. They live next door to each other, and they get along famously. In fact, they have an unusual relationship, because this mother-in-law actually takes advice from her daughter-in-law. That doesn't happen too often in the scheme of family dynamics.

√ Non-Kosher

But when your daughter-in-law is Rose Reisman, one of the country's best-known lifestyle gurus, you pay attention. And Ruth Reisman has certainly benefited. She has lost 50 pounds with the help of Rose Reisman's Personal Gourmet, a catering/ delivery service that brings portion-controlled healthy meals to thousands of people's homes across the GTA. Clients can choose from a variety of nutrition plans for weight loss or for healthy living and weight maintenance. Personal Gourmet also has a line of frozen entrées.

Whatever one purchases through Rose Reisman Catering, which runs Personal Gourmet, you can be sure that the meal is healthy, and tasty, says Rose Reisman. "You won't find any deep fryers in our kitchen. We poach, grill and sear.

"We don't use heavy sauces. We use whole grains. People want healthy food."

Although Reisman has been a highly visible healthy-lifestyle advocate for decades, Rose Reisman Catering has only been around for six years. The company does a lot of corporate work and branched out into special events catering during the last recession. Some of the event venues where you'll find Rose Reisman Catering include the Steam Whistle, and the Science Centre and Four Seasons Centre.

"We do a lot of weddings at the Steam Whistle," she says. "We do many private parties," because people want a healthy alternative to the traditional catered menus.

"Our food is outstandingly delicious. It's healthy, fresh and in season. You eat with your eyes so the food should be colourful."

She cites her vegetable towers as healthy food with beautiful presentation. And there is plenty of flavour in the company's homemade gravlax and the rack of lamb with sweet potato mash, she adds.

Rose Reisman Catering offers an extensive selection of menu items from appetizers and salads to main courses and desserts, says Reisman, pointing out that people can mix and match menu items that include duck wrapped in Chinese crepes; Mediterranean-style grilled fish; steamed halibut; pad thai; mini burritos; miniature beef, turkey or lamb burgers; beef tenderloin; chicken satay skewers served with a light coconut milk sauce; Bollywood-style lentil dishes; a variety of salads, among them, Reisman's signature spinach salad with goat cheese, candied pecans and maple vinaigrette; lamb chops encrusted with pecans; black and white sesame-crusted tuna.

People can also select items from the catering menu of Glow Grill and Wine Bar, the Rose Reisman restaurant in the shopping centre at Don Mills Road and Lawrence Avenue. A popular item at the restaurant is the fresh buffalo mozzarella bar, an imported cheese served on a crostini with a variety of toppings. Mozzarella bar stations have been set up at private parties, and they have been a real hit, says Reisman.

As for desserts, she says all the sweets, from the squares and brownies to the cheesecakes and lemon pies, are cut into portion-controlled sizes. Also available are sorbets in chocolate cups.

Another "delicious and attractive dessert" that can be ordered through the Glow catering menu is a selection from the "guilt-free and decadent" shot-glass desserts. They are essentially portion-controlled and calorie-reduced servings of such items as cheesecake, chocolate mousse and lemon meringue pie attractively presented in a shot glass. "Whipped cream is replaced by meringue and light cream cheese is used instead of butter."

Reisman stresses that catering selections for special occasions can all be customized from the Rose Reisman Catering and Glow catering menus.

Tom's Place owner 'a friend to the Jewish community'

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Kensington Market has always had a reputation as the place to get quality goods at great prices, says Tom Mihalik, owner of Tom's Place (416-596-0297), the iconic discount clothing store at 190 Baldwin St.

Tom's Place – it sells high-end designer suits without the designer price tag – offers value, and so the store reflects the spirit of Kensington Market, Mihalik says.

"We're known for our quality and prices. Just like the old days when people came to buy good food in the market. They came for the quality and price. We're continuing that tradition."

The discount designer fashion retailer draws savvy shoppers who want to buy quality name-brand apparel, says Mihalik. "On the second floor, we carry some of the finest Italian-made suits. We have the greatest labels, but we sell for less."

Mihalik says Tom's Place specializes in suits. "It's easy to find a suit in our store. That's our specialty. We stock well over 10,000 suits.

"We have a great variety of different fitting suits. My sons, Andrew and Robert, are six feet tall – 32 pants and a size 42 shoulder. They tell me that this the only place where they can buy slim suits that fit well and that are tailored for young men."

Mihalik points out that the store provides full alteration services. "We have 10 full-time professional tailors. Some of these tailors have 30 to 40 years of experience.

"Many of them were trained in Europe. It's hard to find tailors of their quality."

He stresses that he is a big supporter of Canadian clothing manufacturers. The people he does business with for his private label are based in Montreal. "We have been dealing with them for over 30 years. I am a great believer in 'made in Canada.' The made-in-Canada label is the greatest quality."

He notes that these Canadian-manufactured suits are made from "very high end fabrics from the great high-end wool mills in Italy. We add Italian flavour to our made-in-Canada product."

Tom's Place is actually the reincarnation of a dry goods business started by Mihalik's father, William, 52 years ago. He opened William's Bargain Store in 1958, shortly after emigrating from Hungary.

Mihalik, 54, says he always enjoyed working in the store. He helped out on weekends and after school. "Selling was something in me. I loved doing it."

He says his father had been a pedlar in Hungary and felt a strong affinity to the Hungarian Jews, many of whom had also been shmatte pedlars. "All his friends were Jews. He considered himself Jewish by association."

In Kensington Market, Mihalik came to know a lot of the Jewish store owners. He saw that their merchandise was reasonably priced. "No price was written in stone."

The market attracted many immigrants, he recounted. "They did not have the income to shop at Eaton's and Simpsons. The market offered better prices on good-quality items.

"It was all very personalized. The storeowners knew everyone by name. My father knew all the clients."

Mihalik says his father ran the store for 20 years, and then he took it over in 1980, changing the name to Tom's Place.

The store, which does $10 million in sales every year, continues to be a family business. Mihalik's father is no longer alive, but his mother, Magda, still comes to the store almost every day. His brother, Willie, and sister, Anette, also work there as does, his eldest son, Tommy Jr.

Mihalik developed close ties to the Toronto Jewish community through his Kensington Market connections and has been a stalwart financial supporter of the Miles Nadal JCC. Most recently, he was honoured by Chabad, as he puts it: "for being a friend to the Jewish community for so many years.

"But they've been my friend for so many years."

Mihalik says his generosity to the community is his way of giving thanks. "The community has given me a lot over the years."

He recalled when his father was wiped out by a fire at the store. "He didn't have insurance. His landlord – he was Jewish – told my father not to worry about the rent."

In his youth, Mihalik spent a lot of time at the Miles Nadal JCC, which was formerly the YMHA. "The Y took me in, when I had no place to go. "I hung out with the older guys, the men from the market. They said, 'Tommy come with us. Come to the shvitz.'

"I went to the shvitz with them. I played basketball. I was never asked if I had a membership. I'll never forget that."

Dressing your son for the party

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

There can be few more special outings for a parent than taking their son shopping for party-wear. Perhaps there's a bar mitzvah coming up, or a family wedding. Maybe he needs a wardrobe upgrade before the High Holidays.

Whatever the reason, every growing boy needs a good pair of pants and some dress shirts for the special occasion. And the process of finding those articles can be moments of shared bonding – or a complete nightmare, depending on how they're handled.

"The boys are an important part of the shopping process," says Paul Spiar, owner of Crawford Boys. "We've heard so many horror stories of how they were treated by other retailers, who will talk about the kids as if they're not even there. We listen to what the children have to say and take their concerns seriously."

Located in Lawrence Plaza at Lawrence and Bathurst, Crawford Boys exclusively sells boys dress clothing, carrying designer brands including Joseph Abboud, DKNY, Tallia, Michael Kors, Ike Behar and Enrico Spago.

The hottest items right now are lightweight sports jackets with comfortable pants for party wear, Spiar says.

"We're almost sold out of a blue-grey-white sports jacket with matching pants that can be worn as a suit or separately. They're so light and comfortable, they can be worn with a sports shirt in a contrasting colour with the sleeves rolled up. It looks really cool," he says.

Sports shirts in bright, fun colours like plum, eggplant-purple and aqua are popular today and boys are tending to dress down for parties, opting for a funky, elegant style rather than a stiff, formal one. Spiar has been in the business for many years, and seen many parent-son combinations walk through his doors.

"I'd encourage the parent doing the purchasing to do some advanced scouting first, so that when your son joins you, you're not dragging him into 12 different stores," he cautions. By minimizing the number of stops, you can make your child happier, which will lead to a more pleasant shopping experience.

He also suggests that parents listen to their son's voice, even if they don't like what he is saying. "He knows what he likes," Spiar insists. "Sure, you can set the boundaries. But once you've done that, let your son choose what he wants rather than forcing him into something he doesn't like. If he chooses it and feels like he looks great in it, he'll be happier and more confident."

Shopping with your son for a first suit or a couple of dressy articles for a special event is almost a rite of passage, says Robyn Negin, owner of North Boys, a store that opened on Disera Drive in Thornhill five weeks ago.

"Come in when your son is relaxed and focus on one thing only, instead of making his party wear part of a larger shopping experience," she suggests. Negin adds your son should be well fed when he arrives, and should know this excursion is all about him. "If he feels like he is empowered and his opinion matters, he'll be more co-operative and more open to trying things on."

North Boys stocks brands including Joseph Abboud, Tallia, DKNY, Michael Kors and Brioso, and Negin says she is always sourcing unique, interesting items.

"A lot of boys are choosing strong jewel tones in the articles they purchase," she says. "They're taking a more active role in selecting their clothes these days, using the clothing to express themselves instead of having mom dress them."

Three great dining choices for your next night out

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

With an endless number of restaurants in Toronto there's no shortage of places to choose from. Whether you're heading out on a date, with your family or with a larger party, making the decision about where to go can be tough. Diners may want to try Brassaii, Yamato or Fune on their next night out.

Brassaii Caterers and Supper Club (416-598-4730) is a multifaceted venue space that serves Mediterranean-inspired cuisine with influences from Morocco, Spain France, Italy and Greece. The large space, located at 461 King St. W., near Spadina Avenue, can hold up to 600 diners.

The restaurant has been open for about eight years, but general manager Vince Antonacci came on board two years ago, when Brassaii was purchased by new owners and redesigned.

Brassaii stands out because it's full of energy and can be a destination where people spend their entire evening.

"People can come here for a cocktail before dinner, stay for a delicious meal, and then stay with us when the place is transformed into a lounge later in the evening. There's no need to figure out the next place to go," Antonacci said.

Brassaii has two private rooms: one that can seat 25 or hold 45 for a reception and a second that can seat 80 or hold 150 for a reception. When holding a large dinner, a client can create a set menu for the group by selecting items off of the main menu. Brassaii also has a large patio that has recently been redesigned.

Some popular menu items include baked grouper gremolata with tomato-curry lentils and carrot cumin sauce that is served at dinner, or spinach and ricotta-filled ravioli for lunch. On weekends between 10 a.m. and 3 p.m., Brassaii serves a classic brunch menu with its own special twist.

Diners looking for Japanese food on their next night out may want to try Yamato (416-927-0077) or Fune (416-599-3868), which are both managed by Anthony Lai.

Yamato, located at 24 Bellair St. in Yorkville, has been open for 29 years.

"There are many Japanese restaurants in Toronto, but we're one of the few that has stood the test of time," Lai said.

Yamato uses traditional Japanese cooking methods and serves dishes such as teriyaki chicken, beef or salmon, udon and soba noodles, as well as a large assortment of sushi and other appetizers.

One of the unique features of Yamato is its 17-seat U-shaped cooking table, where diners can watch their meal be prepared right in front of them by a classic Japanese chef. The entire table can be reserved for one group, or individual small groups and couples can share.

"It's a lot of fun. The chefs do more than just cook for you. They put on a show."

For an upscale Japanese meal, diners should head to Fune, located at 100 Simcoe St. in the heart of the Entertainment District. The recently renovated space takes classic dishes such as teriyaki, tempura, udon, soba noodles and prepares them in a more traditional manner.

Fune is one of the only restaurants in Toronto to have a floating sushi bar, where patrons can sit around the table and select from small plates of sushi as they move by on a conveyor belt. There are 29 seats at the bar.

"It's neat, because not often in a restaurant do you get to see the final prepared dish before you order it. This way people know exactly what they're getting and are more willing to try new foods," said Lai.

Everything you need to party

Laura Fixman

Whether you're looking for giveaways for a bar mitzvah, balloons for a baby shower, or virtually anything else for your party, two local stores have many options for you to chose from.

Party Supply Depot (905-764-5457; www.partysupplydepot.ca) offers a wide variety of items including balloons, wedding decorations, lootbags, tablewear, gift wrap and more. Store owner Mel Grevler said the store has an endless number of choices that can add those special touches to a gathering for any age group.

"Most party stores don't carry as wide a range as we do," Grevler said.

He said you might walk into another store and find three to five options. At Party Supply Depot, however, there will be more than 50 choices for complete patterns for cups, napkins, plates and tablecloths.

They also have a wider selection than most for adult parties, Grevler said, which gives them an edge over their competition. The company started 21 years ago in an 1,800-square-foot location, and now has more than 16,000 square feet in which to showcase its inventory.

Another reason his store is so successful, he said, is that his staff are personable, and most of them know the customers by name.

"My staff are very carefully trained," Grevler said. "I have a very specific manual of knowledge."

Some of the staff at Party Supply Depot have been there for up to 20 years, but no matter how long they have been at the store, they have a thorough knowledge of the inventory available. When you come in, the staff can help you make your selection of colour, pattern or product.

Another store that offers an extensive choice of party favours is Dynamite Parties (905-669-7620; www.dynamiteparties.com). Owner Ken Gutman said the store has just kept getting better since it opened six years ago, and in many cases, it can individualize your choices.

"We shop the world for products we think people will like," Gutman said. "We tailor an order for a customer's budget."

The store again offers a huge range of products, including sports team pillows, candy sticks, crazy hats, rock and roll products and almost anything else you might think of.

Gutman said the store is a fun place where the staff make the shopping experience a memorable one.

"We offer friendly, personalized service," he said. "If we don't have it, we'll go and find it."

He added that they try never to rush people in their shopping. He prefers to let people shop at their own pace and then use the knowledge base of the staff, who will offer suggestions.

Gutman said they want their customers to enjoy themselves while they try to make their choices from such a great selection.

"This is a fun place to be," he said.

Experienced hotel staff smooths out any party bumps

SUTTON PLACE

- ✓ Kosher Food Available
- ✓ Wheelchair Accessible
- ✓ 270 Person Capacity in each ballroom

Any special event should be held at a place that will take the customer's needs seriously.

The Sutton Place Hotel in downtown Toronto prides itself on having the venues and the experience necessary to make events a success.

With 17,000 feet of function space, including three ballrooms, each allowing a capacity of 270 people, the Sutton Place Hotel has been holding all sorts of events for more than four decades.

"We've been at it for 42 years," said Christopher Ashby, the hotel's director of sales and marketing.

With a history of a number of successful parties behind them, there isn't much that catches the Sutton Place staff off guard.

"One of the reasons why a lot of people give us their business is that not only do we have a stellar reputation in the local community, but we've also done it so many times," Ashby said.

Sutton Place Stop 33, the perfect place for your simchah. [Photo courtesy of Sutton Place hotel]

"There is not much that can pop up that we don't know what to do with. And believe me, things always pop up at these events."

It's up to the team at Sutton Place to make sure that nothing spoils the special moment.

"When a bride is having her big day, there really is no room for something to go wrong," Ashby said.

"But when things do, it's just a matter of handling it efficiently and quietly [behind the scenes] to make the bumps go smooth, before anyone even has a chance to notice them."

The Sutton Place Hotel takes care of the ballroom's setup, providing tables and chairs, and the ceremony space.

"While we don't provide a chupah," Ashby said, "we can do everything up to it."

Ashby added: "Because we are a hotel, we can provide accommodations up to and including the bridal suite."

But as with any Jewish simchah, a big selling point is the food.

"Our cuisine is probably best termed as 'modern continental,'" Ashby said. "It certainly encompasses the traditional European countries, but we're definitely not stuck in time."

The Sutton Place Hotel is not a kosher establishment, but it can bring kosher food in from PR Creative Caterers.

Beyond that, the kitchen can make just about anything someone would want on a menu.

"If it's something we're not comfortable with, we'll let you know, but outside of some really detailed Indian cuisine, we haven't come across that situation yet," said food and beverage director Kirk Brady.

While the kitchen often works from the idea of set menus as a base, things can be modified from there.

"If there's something that someone wants that isn't on the menu, we can certainly add it," Brady said.

Despite some changes in popular cuisine, some of the usual suspects are still the highest in demand.

"Black cod is surprisingly popular," Brady said. "Beef tenderloin, though, still wins things hands down."

Things can be set up for two different sets of choices, such as an adult and children's menu at a bar mitzvah. The catering manager will go over the food choices with clients.

"The catering manager works with the clients on menu selection," Ashby said. "But our executive chef, Christopher Duernholz, is definitely actively involved as well.

"It's not usually the chef meeting with the clients, but it will be the chef working with the people."

To book an event at the Sutton Place Hotel, call 416-324-6430 or visit www.suttonplace.com.

Corey Mandell reinvents himself with live music

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

They say everything old is new again and that may be true in the bar and bat mitzvah entertainment business.

For years, every bar or bat mitzvah party had live music. But in the late '80s, interactive DJs began to replace the bands, and by the end of the century, DJs were standard entertainment fare at these simchahs.

Now Corey Mandell, the person who actually spawned the interactive DJ industry in Canada, predicts live music will be making a comeback on the bar and bat mitzvah scene. And he's set to lead that trend in Toronto and Montreal.

Mandell – president of the Mandell Entertainment Group (416-923-7200) – has been an entertainment trend-setter since the age of 17, when he first became a DJ. His interactive and entertaining style became the blueprint for hundreds of other DJs on the bar and bat mitzvah party circuit. He says it's time for a change. "The industry has had the same model for 20 years."

Although the Mandell Entertainment Group has kept a low profile in the simchah business since 2005, the company has been very active in producing the entertainment for some of Canada's most prestigious events, such as the Bell Celebrity Gala, and the Fedex World Conference."

Over the years, Mandell has amassed an "elite stable of entertainers," that include performers, who have been featured in musical theatre productions such as Rock of Ages, We Will Rock You and Jersey Boys, and dancers, who appeared on the reality TV series So You Think You Can Dance. "I'm very excited to be making this calibre of entertainment available in the private market.

"To back these incredible performers, I have assembled two unique show bands that are current, relevant and appeal to all ages. One band specializes in bar and bat mitzvahs and the other, a 14-piece pop orchestra, is well-suited for weddings.

"I've taken my old formula of DJs and dancers, and I have elevated it to a new level featuring incredible live music." He says he introduced this style of entertainment at a recent bat mitzvah at the Science Centre. "It was truly a one-of-a-kind production."

He attributes its success to the fact that the younger generation is starting to appreciate songs from the '70s, '80s and '90s due to the popularity of TV shows such as Glee and American Idol.

With the band's music covering Billboard hits from the last four decades, it appealed to all the age groups at the bat mitzvah. "It's a win-win formula, because kids and adults can now take interest in the same music."

He stresses that the performers in the band are "young, hip and relevant" and they sound extremely close to the artists of the original songs.

Juno Award Winner Shawn Desman, at left, performs with Corey Mandell at a Bat Mitzvah May 22, 2011 in Toronto

Looking back on his career, Mandell says he is proud of his innovative work in the entertainment industry. "I pioneered DJ entertainment production in Canada as it was building in the U.S. It was transformed into a larger-than-life production."

He started the Mandell Entertainment Group when he was 21, and within five years, Mandell was the company of choice for most bar and bat mitzvahs. "We were doing 1,500 events a year. We had 60 to 80 DJs, 100 dancers, 30 to 40 MCs."

Similar entertainment companies were set up by other DJs, many of whom had started out working for Mandell Entertainment, he says.

With the purchase of the Capitol Theatre on Yonge Street in 1999, he says Mandell Entertainment chartered new entertainment territory as the first company to create an event venue in a non-traditional space. "We were booked every night."

In 2002, the Mandell Entertainment Group converted a second venue, the York Theatre on Eglinton Avenue, and in 2003, the company opened the Lobby on Bloor Street, Toronto's first supper club. "It became a celebrity hot spot," Mandell recalls.

By 2005, he decided to "take a break from the bar and bat mitzvah business" and so he sold his contracts for that year. He also signed a non-competition agreement for three years, but he maintained his connection to the entertainment industry by continuing to produce large-scale corporate events and galas.

When Mandell had the chance to buy Camp Timberlane in 2006, he began selling his interest in the restaurant and the event venues. "It was an opportunity to pursue a lifelong passion and dream."

The Capitol was sold in 2006, the York in 2008 and the Lobby in 2009.

Kosher venues close to home

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

You don't have to leave town to host a wonderful simchah. Two exciting locations are working hard to prove that you really can have it all: kosher food, settings ranging from intimate to elegant – and a convenient, central location.

In the heart of downtown, the Park Hyatt Toronto (ParkHyattToronto.com; 416-925-1234) has continuously sought innovation in the over 28 years it has offered kosher catering. Now, says executive chef Joan Monfaredi, in addition to its exciting new range of pastries – including custom wedding cakes – the Park Hyatt has also expanded its services to provide off-site catering.

"It's really taken off," she says. "That's the fastest-growing portion of our business." The Park Hyatt has already brought kosher food to many hotels, private residences and other upscale venues like the AGO, Carlu and ROM. "We roll in with a truck and food and all the culinary staff, all the service personnel."

On-site, the most sought-after space is the Roof Salon, with its 18th-floor view overlooking the twinkling downtown core. Six flexible venues accommodate smaller events or receptions of up to about 250 people. The Mezzanine offers the sophistication of a fireplace and grand piano, while the mahogany and marble elegance of the Queen's Park Ballroom offers dinner for 35 or a reception for up to 600.

"We're a village within one building," says Monfaredi, with wedding specialists, waitstaff and banquet captains, along with complimentary table settings including linens, dishware, cutlery, stemware, show plates and votive candles. "You don't have to worry about where the ice is coming from, where glassware is coming from, china, cutlery, salt and pepper, bread vessels, tablecloths, chairs."

And with its on-site pastry shop, anything is possible. If a client says, "I'd really like to have Twinkies for my bar mitzvah," they get to work creating pareve delights that simply aren't available elsewhere. A contemporary wedding cake might feature tall tiers and simple lines, or elaborate pastillage flowers and white or dark chocolate fondant.

Savoury offerings are equally unparalleled. Monfaredi, who also creates menus for the award-winning on-site non-kosher restaurant Annona, brings all her expertise to the challenges of a kosher kitchen. "All our chefs work in both sides," she adds, and the quality of the kosher offerings reflects those skills and experience.

While most formal events offer a four-course dinner, stations can include "everything from pasta, risotto, carved beef rib-eye, chicken tagine, salmon, sushi, Asian wrap station, or roasted duck and Asian vegetables in a Chinese crepe."

Monfaredi is surprised that after so long, people still say, "We didn't know you guys had a kosher kitchen," but she assures clients that "we are as kosher as kosher can be."

Count on expert planning and sumptuous cuisine, including on-site kosher catering at Park Hyatt.

As an upscale hotel, wedding packages at the Park Hyatt include perks you might not get elsewhere – special overnight rates and a certificate to the on-site Stillwater Spa.

Perhaps a little closer to home is the newly renovated Terraces of Baycrest (416-785-2500, ext. 2477), which offers surprising convenience in a very comfortable setting. In fact, it may be Toronto's best-kept kosher event secret. "It's pretty well one stop," says Sharon Bizouati, supervisor of hospitality services. "We can look after everything."

Over the years, Bizouati has helped plan everything from bar and bat mitzvahs to weddings, engagement parties, family reunions, meetings, conferences, donor events and more for five to 500 people – all kosher.

A variety of spaces can be configured to your event's needs: a fireside lounge can host an intimate dinner for up to 90 people, while other areas accommodate larger groups. With a small synagogue on the premises, plus a serenely landscaped area perfect for a traditional outdoor wedding ceremony, the Terraces truly have it all.

In addition to seamless on-site catering, Bizouati says, "We can recommend musicians, linen, florist" – everything you can imagine to create the perfect event.

Baycrest Hospitality prides itself on its creativity and the quality of its food. For a wine-tasting event, hospitality staff worked with hosts to perfectly pair wines with bite-sized appetizers: a Chianti with a fragrant basil bruschetta, for instance, or a tuna-sesame tidbit to accompany a Pinot Grigio. Other delights included teriyaki salmon and savoury stuffed mushrooms.

Clients who simply wish to take advantage of the beautiful location, now with updated carpeting and drapery, are welcome to bring in any COR caterer to the Terraces' fully equipped meat kitchen. Its central Bathurst Street location is convenient and offers plenty of complimentary parking for any evening or weekend event.

At the heart of the community in more ways than one, Bizouati has been touched by her many referrals from thrilled clients. She's now even seeing a second generation of events from families who came to the Terraces for a bar mitzvah and are now coming to her to book the child's wedding.

No matter what you're looking for in a simchah venue, you won't have to go too far out of your way to find the choice that's just right for your event – surprisingly close to home.

Gift baskets and BeaverTails can enliven an event

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

A tisket, a tasket, how nice to get a basket, especially when it's laden with tasty treats like nuts, chocolates and dry fruit.

If you're looking to send such a delectable basket, Baskets n' Stuf (416-250-9116) offers customized gift baskets and trays for all occasions, says Nili Dzaldov, owner of the specialty store located in the plaza at the southeast corner of Bathurst and Steeles (6237 Bathurst St.).

She says she founded the store 23 years ago to fill a niche in the kosher market. "I started when custom gift baskets just started being popular.

"At the time, there weren't any elegant kosher baskets."

Baskets n' Stuf has COR certification, so the baskets are all kosher, says Dzaldov, adding that she tries to use as many products as she can from Israel. "We also carry a variety of chalav Yisrael chocolates."

Some of the delicacies you might find in her gift baskets include chocolate rocks, chocolate pretzels, cookies, crackers, herbal teas and hand-made chocolate novelty items.

Baskets n' Stuf specializes in custom gift baskets and it also has a wide selection of giftware, says Dzaldov. "There are so many occasions for sending gift baskets. You can send them for all the holidays, get well presents, births, new homes and hostess gifts."

Because she also sells gifts, the baskets can be customized by using some of the gift items as containers, she adds. "A lot of the baskets can include a gift item like a platter or a bowl."

There's also different styles of gift baskets to choose from, says Dzaldov. "We do a selection of trays with goodies like nuts, chocolate and candies or dry fruit. We do chocolate platters and chocolate baskets filled with chocolates. We're very hands on."

She also does a lot of hotel welcome baskets for Jewish organizations and for out-of-town guests attending simchahs.

Baskets n' Stuf delivers, as well, says Dzaldov. " We can ship anywhere in Canada and the U.S."

The store also sells bouquets of helium balloons. Mylar balloons are an option, too.

For giftware, you'll find hostess gifts such as platters, bowls, dinnerware, tea sets, Judaica one-of-a-kind mosaics and more. All the gifts are wrapped at the store, as a complimentary service, says Dzaldov.

For a unique culinary experience, consider having a BeaverTails Pastry station at your next simchah, says Suzanne Steinberg, owner of the GTA BeaverTails Pastry franchise (416-890-9596 or 416-785-3313). "We're doing catering at parties, bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings and sweet sixteens.

"People want something different. They don't want the traditional sweet tables anymore."

Her company also has special equipment and dough prepared at a kosher facility so that she can offer a COR-certified product for kosher venues, she adds.

This tasty novelty food originated in Ottawa about 30 years ago and has been growing in popularity ever since, she says, noting that U.S. President Barack Obama helped put BeaverTails on the map when he brought them home for his daughters after his first official trip to Ottawa. "It's something tasty and a taste unique to Canada."

She has a mobile unit for serving BeaverTails at events such as the CNE and the Royal Winter Fair. Steinberg says the pastry is always prepared at the venue. "It is always served hot and fresh."

The pastry dough is made from yeast and whole and cracked wheat that is hand stretched in an oval shape to resemble a beaver's tail. It's cooked lightly in pure canola oil and then topped with sweet toppings such as cinnamon sugar, chocolate hazelnut spread, apple cinnamon, real maple syrup or vanilla icing.

Toppings such as crushed Oreo cookies, Reese's Pieces or fresh banana can also be added.

The tails are brushed with the toppings and wrapped in BeaverTail napkins, so people can walk around eating the pastry, Steinberg explains.

A new catering option is BeaverBites: the pastry is shaped in balls and served hot with ice-cream on top. The ice-cream can be drizzled with chocolate or caramel sauce and topped with crushed Oreos or candy. "It's an alternative to the traditional BeaverTail."

The pastry is also popular at corporate events, because it's something so Canadian, says Steinberg.

She notes that current U.S. Secretary of State Hilary Clinton tried a BeaverTail when she was U.S. first lady, but at the time, she didn't get the same media attention as Obama did when he sampled this novelty food.

In fact, Steinberg points out that BeaverTails were the only Canadian food requested at the annual international meeting of corporate leaders and politicians in Davos, Switzerland.

"BeaverTails were also served at President Obama's inauguration. It's a fun food and a tasty food."

Women's clothes that give you a new look

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

If you have any preconceived ideas about pre-owned clothing, leave them at the door when you visit Déjà Vu Boutique in Markham, at Main and 16th Avenue. This upscale store of gently used apparel is nothing like your neighbourhood thrift store. Designer clothes hang on the racks still bearing their labels from the dry cleaner and gowns that might cost $350 brand new are selling for half the price or less – and don't look worn in the least.

"Women are often surprised when they come into the store," confesses Theresa Lobraico, owner of Déjà Vu. "They don't expect the clothes to be in such great condition."

Passionate about fashion, she opened the store to solve a problem she knew many women had with their wardrobes. "You buy a new outfit, wear it once or twice, and then you don't want to be seen over and over wearing the same clothes," she says. "They're in great shape, it's just that you're ready for something new."

The boutique sells some new articles in its mix, but the hard part is discerning what's brand new and what is not, since all the clothes are in new condition.

"We're very particular about what we accept," Lobraico explains. "Clothes have to arrive on hangers, freshly laundered and ironed."

Many women arrive at the store with their daughters, and she's found shoppers in their 20s walking out the door with purchases alongside their mothers. The boutique caters to a demographic of female shoppers through age 75, and carries a selection of coveted designer labels that will make you reach for your purse. For more information call 905-472-9566.

A woman who struts like a peacock in her latest outfit could be accused of diva-ism. What woman, however, could resist the opportunity to exude the peacock's aura without the need to strut – to have it envelop her naturally and effortlessly? Could you?

We didn't think so.

No designer enrobes you in a rainbow of magnificence like Chacok. And no shop showcases her wares better than Quasar Mode (416-964-1214, www.quasarmode.com), one of Canada's leading purveyors of European fashion since 1983.

Neither Chacok nor the other labels carried here answer the classic definition of eveningwear. But they turn heads morning, noon, and night with styles that carry seamlessly from your next event to a stroll on the beach.

Chacok, in particular, takes whimsical versatility to a whole new level, says owner Ginette Beauchamp. "And at no time in Chacok's history is that more true than this season," she says. "Colour has always been her hallmark, but this spring/summer collection is her most spectacular in years."

A fuschsia grouping, in particular, draws gasps from in-store shoppers and window shoppers alike. The garments glow with a radiance that gives a mere mannequin life and breath.

For the woman who dares to be different, most pieces in this collection will provide a stirring statement at any event. Unlike traditional eveningwear, however, they won't go into your closet the morning after.

Hard Rock Café can handle any party

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

The Hard Rock Café has been hosting music-themed events since 1978. With its location right in the heart of downtown Toronto, at 279 Yonge St. overlooking Yonge-Dundas Square, it's the perfect venue for your next party.

The venue is popular for any simchah or event, including bar and bat mitzvahs, sweet 16s, corporate events, press releases and project launches, as well as charity events.

"Philanthropy is a big part of what we do," said Marcelo DeOliveira, the sales and marketing manager at the Toronto location. Recently, the restaurant hosted a Mother's Day brunch with proceeds benefiting the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation.

HARD ROCK CAFÉ

- √ Non-Kosher
- √ Wheelchair Accessible
- √ Over 300 Person Capacity

The Hard Rock Café is also currently selling T-shirts and pins designed by Ringo Starr that are being sold to support Make-A-Wish Canada, which helps grant wishes to children with life threatening medical conditions.

This location has two separate rooms, the Hard Rock Café and the Hard Rock Lounge, which are on two different levels and can be used for any type of celebration.

The lounge, located on the second floor, can be used for private functions and offers a full audio-visual system and the ability to host DJs, 3-to-5 piece bands, interactive karaoke bands, dancers, etc. The venue is versatile enough to fit a small intimate gathering of 50 people or a 350-person standing reception. For larger parties, the entire restaurant can be rented out, and it can hold up to 500 people for a reception or 350 for a seated meal. Hard Rock Café is fully accessible, with wide doorways and elevators to get to upper levels.

The sales department at the Hard Rock Café is fully capable of helping party planners with every decision from the moment they choose Hard Rock as their venue.

"We help people figure out how they want to set up the room, choose their menu and refer them to outside vendors," said DeOliveira. "We are involved in the event from steps A to Z and are on site the day of until the last person leaves. We ask our clients to be guests at their own events and not worry about anything. It's our responsibility to make sure everything runs smoothly – your responsibility is to relax and have a good time."

One of the advantages of choosing Hard Rock as your venue is that you don't need to worry about decorations.

"I would guess that close to 98 per cent of our clients do not choose to bring in decorations. The room comes with a built-in theme of music and doesn't need anything else. These are people that have a love and appreciation for music, so it is already decorated for them" said DeOliveira.

Examples of memorabilia in the party room includes a bass guitar once played by Kiss rocker Gene Simmons and a corset worn by Madonna. "We have a mix of items from every genre of music, not just rock."

The menu for parties is endless and is designed by the clients themselves – they don't need to choose from a standard group package. For most events people will choose about six different menu items – two options each for a reception, dinner and dessert. Examples of adult main courses are beef teriyaki or grilled chicken marsala.

"From experience, we make extra of the children's meals – foods like chicken tenders, sweet potato fries or macaroni and cheese. The adults always gravitate toward these!"

Videos take you back to a simchah

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Personalized video is a valuable family heirloom that can transport people back to a simchah long after it has ended.

Josh Israel founded Video Productions by Josh (905-709-9277, www.videobyjosh.com) in 1979 and since then has filmed more than 3,200 Jewish events.

In the last 32 years, Israel has earned the reputation as one of the best videographers in the city. This is due to his commitment to high standards for the final product, his use of high-tech up-to-date equipment, his creativity and ability to capture important moments on camera, and his emphasis on client satisfaction and customer service.

Israel uses one of the best cameras on the market, one that shoots in high definition and is very sensitive to the lights in the room so he does not need to carry his own bright, glaring lights with him. "This makes taking the video much less invasive," said Israel. It also gives the final product much more clarity and colour. "It greatly improves the watching experience. This shift to high-definition is one of the biggest changes to videography in years."

High definition is one of the biggest changes to videography in years

Israel films 95 per cent of events personally and does all of the editing. "I go through all the film, inch by inch, to make sure all the important moments are part of the final product." The completed video is typically two to three hours long, and it includes an introduction, baby pictures, special effects and a soundtrack. The video closes with a flashback of the best moments of the video.

Israel books events about one year in advance.

For a unique video, party planners may be interested in Your Life Productions (416-762-4100, www.yourlifeproductions.com) which specializes in creating tribute videos for families and companies.

"By tribute video, we mean everything from a scripted, A&E-style biography, to a compelling documentary on a family business, to a hilarious TV news 'mockumentary,'" said Bob Pomerantz, president of Your Life Productions.

Your Life Productions has been creating tribute videos for nearly 25 years, after Pomerantz came up with the concept while working an overnight shift at the Toronto Star. "In the beginning, I was just dreaming of a job where I would get to write, but also get to sleep at night. Fortunately, other people believed in my idea, and one year later I was able to quit working nights and focus on these videos full time."

The tribute videos can be family legacies that are used as a memory for younger generations. These videos are often filmed in secret and revealed as a surprise for the honorees. "Imagine a video where someone has scripted your biographical past. The lights are turned down, and suddenly your life is being playing out in front of you. It's very powerful" said Pomerantz.

When clients approach Pomerantz about creating a tribute video, the first thing they will do together is figure out what key messages the client wants to convey. They will then decide who will be featured in the video. Pomerantz then will do research on the family, write a script, and then shoot the film and edit the final product to broadcast quality. The whole process takes from three to six months, and the tribute video is typically 15 minutes in length.

Some celebrities that have been featured in tribute videos Pomerantz had made include broadcaster Roger Ebert, actor Mr. T., singer Gordon Lightfoot and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

Matchmaker, Matchmaker...

Liana Shlien
Special to The CJN

Two seasoned Toronto expert go-betweens offer their modern approach to traditional Jewish matchmaking for the marriage-minded.

With many Jewish singles lacking time in their busy, career-oriented lives to find suitable potential life partners, more are doing what their bubbies and zaides would have done – turning to the services of a matchmaker in order to make a shidduch.

Eve Potok, founder of Soulmates, has been introducing Jewish singles to each other for more than 21 years. "It was divine intervention," says Potok, whose other passion besides matchmaking is Torah study.

Since successfully setting friends up in high school, Potok went online in 1995 with www.soulmates.net and now has established networking contacts worldwide.

"We're trying to create a oneness for Jewish singles," she says.

To complement its personalized and discreet matchmaking services, Soulmates recently launched a free Jewish dating application on Facebook: http://apps.facebook.com/soulmatesnet, in recognition of the growing use of social media by younger singles in particular.

Potok searches proactively on behalf of her clients, ensuring their optimal representation to eligible matches in ways a standard dating site can't always convey. By combining professional screening and far-ranging, trusted connections, Potok says her introduction service maintains an impressive 75 per cent success rate.

Jewish Connections Inc., is a personalized introduction service for professionals looking to meet like-minded individuals. Jewish Connections' vision is Jewish continuity in the community. Carole Linden's fascination with the dynamics of male-female relationships led to a professional matchmaking career that began in 1994 with her service, Jewish Connections.

Her mission is to connect Jewish people who share core values and seek a committed, lasting relationship.

Potential members receive a free one-on-one consultation upon completing online registration at www.jewishconnectionsinc.com, with no obligation to join.

Linden works exclusively with each member over the course of a year, offering unlimited introductions and referrals for the initial sign-up period.

"This is not assembly line dating. It's a well thought out process," says Linden, who offers support, date coaching and ongoing feedback over the course of the matches presented.

"Over the last 17 years, I have made thousands of matches and many have resulted in marriages and/or long-term relationships," Linden says. "Having an exact number is hard to say because, when people are in a successful relationship, they stop calling."

Both Toronto-area matchmakers serve Jewish men and women of a wide range of ages and affiliations who are ready to find their bashert.

How to avoid gift duplications

Everyone wants to buy the bride and groom the perfect gift. Unfortunately, this can be difficult since it's hard to know what the couple needs, and almost impossible to find out what other guests are purchasing so there aren't duplications.

Luckily, two Toronto linen companies help make this job easier by offering gift registries. A registry is a service provided by a company to assist engaged couples in the communication of gift preferences to their wedding guests. The couple can visit the store, create a list of items they want, and then the list is made public to their guests. Once a guest purchases something off the registry, the list is updated. This way, the couple won't receive duplicate or unwanted gifts, and the guest never has to worry about purchasing something the couple does not need.

David's Fine Linens (416-590-7311, www.davidsfinelinens.com), in the Bayview Village Mall, has been providing newlyweds with wedding gifts for more than 25 years. "We sell only the finest and most luxurious items" says David Sinai. "Every bride wants to receive our products."

David's Fine Linens sells towels, bedsheets, pillows, duvets, tablecloths and other household items. Everything is imported from Europe to ensure the highest quality. "These are some of the most high-end brands in the world. Our stuff is used by royalty," says Sinai.

"The benefit of using a registry is that you know you're getting the couple a gift they can use," says Sinai. "It really takes the guesswork out of buying a present. Every item in our store can be put on the registry – so if you follow the list, you can't go wrong." Sinai added that guests can choose to share the cost of a more expensive gift.

The bride or groom should make an appointment ahead of time with David's Fine Linens and select the items the couple wishes to receive as gifts. "This way, we can make sure they have one of our staff assist them through the whole process. Lots of brides want to choose a colour scheme for their homes – the registry lets people know what colours they choose."

Deblins Linens (416-782-2910, www.deblins.com) is another Toronto-based linen company that offers wedding registries. With a location in Toronto and one in Vaughan, Deblins Linens has been in business for more than 30 years. "Our stores are huge – over 10,000 square feet – so we have a huge variety of products," says Leona Schwalder, Deblins Linens administrative assistant.

Deblins Linens sells a variety of bedding, towels, tablecloths and pillows. "We import products from around the world," says Schwalder. "We seek out the highest quality."

Deblins has knowledgeable and loyal sales associates. "Most of our staff have been with us for over 10 years" says Schwalder. "This means they know the products intimately. They'll be able to tell you the difference between each brand of towels, and can make recommendations for people that need some assistance choosing a gift. It really makes buying a gift a good experience."

Deblins Linens offers customers points for every purchase they make. "People can either use the points they earn to buy a gift for themselves, or they have the option to donate points to the couple getting married," says Schwalder.

Beautifully renovated party venues at On the Park

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

A Toronto landmark is back in business. On the Park Events and Conference Centre is a recreation of the iconic Inn on the Park.

The ballroom and other party facilities of the former Inn on the Park have been preserved and are enjoying new life under new ownership. They make up a new venue called On the Park Events and Conference Centre (416-510-2002).

"We reopened two years ago," says general manager John Neretlis. "The space is all the same, but it's been totally renovated.

"People walking through comment on how fabulous the renovation was. The high point is the chandeliers in the foyer.

"It's hard to miss the four huge crystal chandeliers. They're eight feet tall, and 10 feet all-around. They're quite impressive."

A lot of money was put into the renovation, he adds. "All the rooms have audiovisual built in. The kitchen was redone. All the equipment is state of the art."

Six of the party venues from the former hotel have been preserved, he says, noting that the names of those rooms have not been changed.

The largest space is the Centennial Ballroom, which holds up to 1,000 people for a cocktail party or theatrical event. The room can accommodate 850 people for a sitdown dinner.

There is a large reception area outside the ballroom, which is conducive to cocktail and hors d'oeuvres.

As in the past, kosher catering is an option, says Neretlis. "PR Creative Catering is the kosher provider.

"They do an excellent job. That's why we partnered with them. They provide a high-quality kosher experience. They're great guys to work with."

The décor of the Centennial Ballroom is neutral so it will work well with the colour theme of an event, but extra décor is not necessary, says Neretlis. "The way the room was done, it looks fantastic."

The Trillium Room, which is next to the ballroom, can be used for family celebrations and is commonly used for bedeckens. He describes the Harvest Room as "lighthearted." The room, which holds 200 people, is all glassed in. "When you look out see you can see the skyline. The CN Tower is in view."

On the Park Events also offers smaller rooms for more intimate family affairs or corporate events, says Neretlis, citing the Four Seasons Room as an example. The "boldly decorated room" can hold 60 to 70 people for cocktails or 30 for dinner.

He says the venue offers four to five star dining, which is a similar standard set by the Inn on the Park.

The kitchen can prepare menus, but everything can be customized. "It's one of the things we like to do. We're open right at the start.

"The sales staff bring in the executive chef to meet with the client. He's there and he's available."

The choice of menu depends on the event. "Sometimes our clients tell us, 'We want to have a buffet with fries and chicken fingers.'"

The facility is nut-free, and the kitchen also tries to accommodate special dietary needs of the guests.

On the Park Events and Catering provides a card with each invitation so guests can contact the venue directly about specific dietary concerns.

"If someone has a food allergy or other diet issue, we'll prepare a meal suited to their medical needs. As long as we know about it, we can prepare an excellent selection for them. It's all about client service."

New choices from trusted names

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

The old-fashioned kosher butcher shop may be gone, but an exciting new trend is emerging in its place: the meat store with catering, offering new heights of gourmet prepared foods that will proudly take centre stage at any event.

Two local retailers can now cater an outstanding array of delicious food – building and securing their established reputation in Toronto's kosher world.

In association with Hartman's Kosher Meats, 24 Carat Events (24 Carat Events, 905-370-0262) strives to combine the best in kosher food with the best in event planning. Executive chef Mitchell Lipperman joins event-planning partner Amanda Murad, formerly of Daniel et Daniel, to create the kind of full-service event management that's rare in the kosher world.

Part of what makes 24 Carat Events special, says Murad, are its "exclusive relationships with name brands that are well known: Hartman's kosher foods, Yarden [charcuterie meat products] from Israel… exclusivity to the kosher franchising of Hero Burgers, Lettieri Coffee Bar."

Lettieri coffee will also be available in Hartman's new south location, on Bathurst Street between Wilson and Lawrence avenues. Because the location serves meat, all coffee products will be pareve.

Murad says that "Hartman's is known for heimish-style food, prepared foods… shivahs, Shabbat lunches." 24 Carat hopes to leverage that reputation into the realm of kosher events. As executive chef for Hartman's, Lipperman has created popular prepared foods, soups and sauces. Now, with 24 Carat, he'll bring that quality and reputation out of the retail setting into any venue, on any scale.

Lipperman is confident that he's up to the task. From his training at the Royal York Hotel to catering a film festival closing gala for 5,000 people in a tent, he says there's no limit to what 24 Carat is capable of.

√ Kosher Caterers

For one 500-person Zareinu fashion show at the ROM, the event began at 6:30 p.m. and he wasn't even allowed access until after 5 p.m. when the museum closed. With enough organization and preparation, there's nothing he can't do: even deliver the perfect prime rib hot and "menu-matched" to a non-kosher function.

In the new Hartman's location, 24 Carat's flavours will be available for takeout as well. "Twenty or 30 different items in prepared food cabinets," Lipperman says, in addition to a range of desserts and pastries made primarily on site.

Whether it's pastries or savoury foods, Lipperman emphasizes fresh, high-quality ingredients. "We offer the very best – that doesn't necessarily mean it has to be the most expensive. A great pasta salad is relatively inexpensive, but it has to have fresh ingredients. That is where we are going to set ourselves apart."

With a name like Glatt Kosher Centre (905-597-7571), you'd expect the highest kashrut standards, and you wouldn't be disappointed. But you might be surprised to find more than just the typical "takeout" foods. Owner Anat Porges, formerly of Perl's in the same Thornhill plaza location, is serving up tasty surprises for kosher events in the venue of your choice.

Glatt Kosher Centre isn't all about heavy meat meals, either. Porges now has a chef who strictly prepares kosher sushi. Because it's prepared in a completely separate area from meat products, all sushi is pareve. Classic selections like California Rolls, can also be ordered for catering. Other non-meat items include Mushroom Crepes and a Caesar Salad with pareve dressing, to round out the menu and satisfy every taste.

Expanded offerings don't mean Porges has stopped selling any of her customers' perennial favourites. Her low-fat barbecued chicken is just as popular as ever, and a line of Chinese food is also still going strong. She adds that her chopped liver is "the best in town," an addictively rich and nostalgic taste for the customers who come from far and wide to buy it.

With summer coming up, your best bet might be choosing uncooked meat from one of the barbecue-ready marinated selections. There's a whole butterflied, seasoned, bone-in chicken that Porges says is "very nice – you just throw it on the barbecue."

If you're not sure whether a cut of meat will barbecue well, Porges and her knowledgeable staff can help guide you to an experience that will satisfy your unique tastes. "If you like it tender, quick cooking, slow cooking… which meat is going to be soft on the barbecue, like for shish kabob."

Whether for the barbecue or any special meal, if there's something you want, but you don't see it in the store, a rack of lamb, for example, just let her know – it can probably be specially ordered.

For catering anything from a shivah to a business lunch or an even larger event, almost anything on the menu is available – and more. Chinese selections like General Tso chicken, Jewish classics like Chicken Noodle Soup with Kreplach, contemporary choices like sushi or stir-fry: the choice is yours at a very reasonable price, for any group up to about 200 people.

Neither Porges nor Lipperman may be the old-fashioned kosher butcher your bubbies or zaides knew, but in their committment to kashrut and their expert attention to quality and flavour, their catering services bring a new and welcome dimension to the world of kosher meat.

Living the low-price dream at The Israeli Source

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

Keeping down the high cost of being Jewish – does it sound like a dream? It was for Chuck and Barbara Elnekave until February 2006, when the couple made the dream a reality, not just for themselves, but for the entire community, at The Israeli Source (905-482-2025; www.israelisource.com), their "big-box" 4,000-foot Judaica centre on Doncaster Road in Thornhill.

As the name suggests, the store specializes in Israeli items, though the selection doesn't stop there. Wedding glass Judaica by American artist Gary Rosenthal is always popular, incorporating shards of the glass broken under the chuppah into a keepsake the couple will cherish.

Books and practical items for Jewish life offer one-stop convenience. "Our whole store is one big catalogue of wedding gifts," Chuck Elnekave says.

Personalization makes almost any gift more meaningful, and there are some surprising choices. Anything from a challah board or cover to a siddur or kiddush cup can be customized for the recipient, usually in only about a week or two.

And for bar mitzvahs, don't stop at the fountain pen. What about a gift book, shofar or tzedakah box?

For a bris or a young child, there are Jewish baby books, stuffed Torahs, aleph-bet products – even "little tiny kippahs for the babies." A small kiddush cup with the baby's name is the perfect gift to grow into. The store also offers seasonal specialties for all ages at deep discounts.

It may be possible to find similar items elsewhere, if you go from store to store searching. But, Elnekave says, "The big difference with us is the price. We've been open just over five years, and in that time, we have saved our customers millions of dollars off the suggested retail prices."

Saving money is especially important if you're hosting a simchah. "Why spend more than you have to?" Elnekave comments.

"We're always adding in new items people can use for their parties."

These little touches can really add up unless you keep an eye on the bottom line – or let The Israeli Source do it for you.

Saving money doesn't mean locking yourself into fewer choices. The kippah combinations alone are almost endless, and with variations in fabrics, styles, sizes, colours and patterns, there are probably thousands of possibilities. "I could easily do thousands upon thousands of orders and not have a single one the same as the other."

There are even hand-crocheted kippot, a truly one-of-a-kind keepsake. Handmade in Israel, they can be readily customized in the colours and pattern of your choice. "If you can show us the design you want, we'll get it done." Even these are also surprisingly affordable.

As for benchers, there are Ashkenazi, Sephardi and chassidic texts to choose from in simple designs, or others that offer stunning photography or elaborate art designs. Other benchers feature "bonuses" like Megillat Esther, kiddush and zmirot (songs) for Shabbat and holidays, or a small siddur.

For a take-home gift they'll remember and use often, there's even a bencher pen – a regular working pen with a small pull-out scroll with all the words to Birkat Hamazon. "You can get them with a custom message printed on the outside." Worried your guests might already have one? Give a pen with a pullout version of Tfillat HaDerech (the travellers' prayer) or the Minchah/Ma'ariv service.

For observant guests at a weekday bar mitzvah, another new and exciting favour is a compact-style mirror, which can be personalized with the name and date. Male guests can use it to check that they have put on their tfillin properly.

Another interesting event keepsake might be a challah cover, with a custom-embroidered message guests would see each time the cover was used.

Most of the items in the store, especially benchers and Judaica items, come from Israel. Those available in Canada and in the United States are great products, but don't allow as much customization."

Sourcing through Israeli suppliers, Elnekave says, "allows the customers a lot more flexibility in terms of how they customize the products."

As with any warehouse store, The Israeli Source may have traded store esthetics for practicalities – supersized shelves and long aisles jam-packed with goodies. But with millions of dollars saved, Elnekave has delivered on his pricing promise. It's not just a dream – meaningful, unique and affordable Judaica is alive and well at The Israeli Source.

Teens make a difference

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's B'nai Tzedek teen philanthropy program helps young people make a difference for others by establishing their own tzedekah funds.

Hannah Davis, now an 18-year-old kinesiology student at Queen's University, told The CJN that becoming involved with B'nai Tzedek at the time of her bat mitzvah was one of the best decisions she ever made, although she was skeptical at first.

She knew she wanted to donate her bat mitzvah gifts to charity, but she had in mind a one-time project, not a long-term involvement.

After her parents told her about the program, she went to an initial meeting with an open mind, she said.

What appealed to her was "the whole concept that this fund enables me every year to be able to give a significant gift. Even though I'm just a teenager and don't have a steady income, I'm able to make a significant charitable donation like many adults within the community."

Angela D'Aversa, assistant director of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, oversees the program, which is about eight years old.

"The ultimate goal of the [teen philanthropy] program is to engage kids at a younger age in tikkun olam and giving back to the community," she said. "It's so impressive to me to see how kids really do care about others, and how they want to give back."

As well as donating funds, participants and potential participants have the option of taking part in a twice-yearly social action day, when they learn about community agencies and pick one to volunteer at.

Sometimes, as a result, they pick one of the projects to donate to. Other ideas may come up at school or around the dinner table, she said. "Sometimes we suggest [something] that ties in with their interests."

A few girls have been involved with facilitating dance programs for children at a community centre in Sderot, and even donated their old costumes.

To set up a fund, participants must donate a minimum of $1,000. About 170 youngsters have started their own funds since B'nai Tzedek's inception eight years ago, and about 20 more are starting out with the program. "It's a good learning opportunity," said D'Aversa.

While a lot of kids are already "very savvy," she noted, others are starting out with less knowledge about donating money or how interest works.

"We want to help educate them about community needs, we want them develop their leadership skills, we want to make sure they have a lifelong commitment with tzedakah, and it gives them an opportunity to network with other teens who have a common interest. It really empowers them," D'Aversa said.

After participants enter university, they have other opportunities to continue their involvement with the foundation, she added. "That's what we want... They're our leaders for tomorrow."

For more information, call 416-631-5833, or visit www.bnaitzedek.ca.

K Barketti and Edith's Fashions have you covered

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

At any wedding, all eyes may be on the bride, but that doesn't mean her mother and the other important women in her life don't want to look beautiful as well. Luckily, there are stores in Toronto that specialize in women's formalwear so that everyone at the party can look their best.

K Barketti, 416-225-6733, has two locations, 434 Eglinton Ave. W. in Forest Hill and inside Square One Shopping Centre in Mississauga. It specializes in high-end, fashion-forward ladieswear specifically for mothers of the bride.

"We carry the perfect dresses for every occasion," said Terrie Walia, president of K Barketti. "We do a lot of custom work, so even if you think you can't find anything to wear, we will make it for you. Most stores don't have the design team we do."

Walia says the store carries a large selection of fabrics imported from Europe and has in-house designers to create the beautiful garments. "We're very popular in the Orthodox community, because we're able to easily create modest wear that is still elegant."

Walia says the upcoming trends to look for this fall are tweeds as well as grey and beige tones. "Of course, black is still the primary colour for evening wear."

For more formalwear, women can visit Edith's Fashions, (416-633-4222, www.edithsfashions.com) at its new location at 1113 Finch Ave. W., just west of Dufferin Street.

"Our store has 12,000 square feet of party dresses and evening gowns. There are just so many options, so much merchandise!" said Clare Nisker, Edith's artistic director and buyer.

Edith's specialty is mother-of-the-bride gowns, but Nisker promises she can find you something to wear to any event, whether it be a bar mitzvah, a gala or a charity dinner. The store also has casual dresses for guests at any event.

"One of the things that makes us stand out as a company is that we carry clothes that fit the average-sized Canadian woman" said Nisker. She explained that many formalwear stores in Toronto carry dresses only up to size 12, which is often too small, since the average woman in Canada is a size 16.

"These are beautiful women, who may have a bigger chest, waist or hips, but they still want to feel fabulous and look amazing. Edith's saw this was missing in the market, so we made it our goal to meet the needs of women of all sizes."

The store carries dresses and gowns from size 4 to 26 in-store and can custom order larger sizes.

Another reason Edith's stands apart from other formalwear stores is that is has one of the most up-to-date, technologically forward alteration facilities right on its premises.

"These are people with a fashion designing background. Since 90 per cent of women need some type of alterations on their dresses, it only makes sense that we do it for them on site," said Nisker.

In addition to dresses and gowns, Edith's carries all the accessories women need for their big night. "We have stunning jewelry that we import from New York and across Canada," Nisker said.

The store also sells shoes, undergarments including a line of Spanx products, and has an in-house hat designer.

"Since the royal wedding, she can't keep up with all the orders!"

Want party 'insurance'?

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Planning the perfect simchah isn't easy. With so many decisions to make, it can be a stressful experience, so after all that work, most people want to just sit back and enjoy their special night without worrying about the last-minute details. Fortunately, hiring an event co-ordinator can take the stress off the host.

Tamara Temes (905-770-7977) began her consulting business about 16 years ago after she got married. With her background in public relations and corporate event planning, it was a natural next step in her career. "I felt there was a need for a new kind of bridal and party consultant, one who would treat each of their simchahs as if it was as important as their own," said Temes.

She explained that choosing to use a party consultant is like purchasing an insurance package for your party. You are ensuring that your event, whether it be a bar mitzvah, wedding, or anniversary party, runs according to plan, and that if anything does go wrong, you have someone there who will quickly and efficiently find a solution.

Recently, Temes has launched a new initiative for those celebrating their bar or bat mitzvah. "What I'm doing is getting parents and kids excited about giving back to their community. We're putting the mitzvah back in bar mitzvah through donations or volunteer projects," said Temes.

"At the end of the day, this rite of passage in the Jewish religion is not about which DJ you booked or how many presents you got. It is about teaching our children, as they take this step into adulthood, that one of the most important mitzvot in our religion is performing acts of kindness." In the spirit of giving, Temes donates 10 per cent of her salary to the charity of her client's choice.

Above all else, Temes prides herself on her flexibility and believes that is what makes her stand out from other party consultants. "I go above and beyond the typical duties, and will do anything to help my client. I've written wedding speeches, gone dress shopping with clients – you name it and I will do it."

Another Toronto party consultant is Judy Stein (905-764-2728), founder of Judy Stein Consulting. Stein has been in the business for 35 years, since she was 18 years old, when she fell into the role. "I was working part-time in the jewelry business and sold a young couple their wedding bands. They told me they liked me and asked if I wanted to help plan their wedding. I figured I would give it a try, and before I knew it, word had spread."

Stein explains that her philosophy about simchah planning developed over the years, as she watched her friends and family get married. "I looked around and would see consultants ordering their clients around and telling them what to do. I never do that. I listen to what my client wants, and while I will give my opinions, I make it clear that ultimately the choice is not up to me."

The good thing about Judy Stein Consulting, whether the work is done by Stein herself or one of her eight colleagues, is that by the time it's the day of the simchah, every detail has already been taking care of. "It's the most important day for my client, but... our work is done so you don't need to worry about anything."

If there is one piece of advice Stein can offer to soon-to-be-brides it would be to not let friends and family make you nervous about the decisions you've made, or the decisions you still need to make, about your wedding. "Everyone will try to give you their opinions and that can be overwhelming. Instead of getting stressed out, just answer them by saying, 'I've got Judy!'"

Stein said that using a timeline of what decisions and which vendors need to be booked, she keeps everything on track.

She added that often the biggest concern for a bride is finding her wedding dress. "In 35 years, I've never had a naked bride," she said, laughing. "I promise we will find you the perfect one at the right time."

Religion ban in daycare challenged

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A coalition of Jewish, Catholic and Coptic Christian parents and organizations has launched a constitutional challenge to the Quebec government's banning of religious instruction in publicly subsidized daycares in the province.

The coalition says the directive, which went into effect June 1, discriminates against families who want their particular religion to continue to be the orientation of the $7-a-day Centres de la petite enfance (CPE) that their children attend.

CPEs that don't comply with the new rules will have their funding suspended or eliminated.

The coalition, called Quebecers for Equal Rights to Subsidized Day Cares, filed its case in Quebec Superior Court the day before the regulation was to come into effect and then called a press conference.

The coalition, which was formed two weeks ago, is endorsed by the Association of Childcare Centres of the Jewish Community, as well as by Federation CJA and the Association des Parents Catholiques du Québec. It also claims to have the support of more than 200 Quebecers of different religious and cultural backgrounds.

Danielle Sabbah

Represented by lawyer Marie-Josée Hogue, the coalition is basing its challenge on both the Canadian and Quebec charters of human rights.

In the interim, the coalition is seeking an injunction to delay the implementation of the directive until the courts hear and decide on the case. A decision on that was expected within a week or two.

"The Quebec government is acting against the best interests of our children and our communities, and is infringing on our constitutional rights by pushing ahead with incoherent and inapplicable directives to exclude the religious and spiritual dimensions of life from publicly funded daycare centres," said coalition co-chair Sandy Jesion, the father of a child in a CPE with a Jewish orientation.

The coalition is arguing that daycare is "an extension of the home" and that providers "essentially stand in the place of parents," so children should be able to go to a CPE that reflects his or her family's beliefs.

Chief Backs Farber

TORONTO —Former York Region police chief Armand La Barge has endorsed former Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber, who is seeking to win the riding of Thornhill for the Liberals in the Oct. 6 Ontario election. Farber, who was with Congress for 27 years, including six as CEO, hopes to beat incumbent Progressive Conservative MPP Peter Shurman, a former radio broadcaster who has held the seat since 2007. Speaking at a campaign kickoff event last month, La Barge said Farber was a key resource for police on hate and antisemitism when he was chief.

Group Defies Baird

MONTREAL — A group calling itself the Canadian Boat to Gaza (CBG) said last week it will defy Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird's May 28 warning against "unauthorized efforts to deliver aid" to Gaza, which he called "provocative" and "unhelpful." The group said it will send a boat on the second "Freedom Flotilla" this month, adding that Baird was trying "to abdicate the Canadian government's obligation to ensure the safety of the Canadians who will be on board the flotilla... and to justify, in advance, any crimes Israel may commit against peaceful unarmed civilians." In May 2010, Israeli forces killed nine Turkish nationals aboard a boat in the Mediterranean that was part of a flotilla seeking to break Israel's blockade of Hamas-ruled Gaza.

WORLD

Union Backs Boycott

LONDON — For the third time since 2007, Britain's largest academic union voted for an academic and cultural boycott of Israel. The resolution passed May 29 at the University and College Union's (UCU) annual conference in Harrogate, Yorkshire. In voting for sanctions, UCU – which represents more than 120,000 British academics – ignored the legal advice it received after the first boycott vote in 2007 that a boycott would be unlawful and unworkable. Academic Friends of Israel, formed in 2002 to fight boycotts of Israel by British groups, condemned the vote.

Day School Closes

TOLEDO, Ohio — The only Jewish day school in Toledo, Ohio, is closing at the end of the school year this week due to a lack of enrolment. The David S. Stone Hebrew Academy, which serves kindergarten to grade 5, dropped from an enrolment of more than 100 students several years ago to 22 this year, the Toledo Blade reported. It was founded in 1968 and served all denominations. The United Jewish Council of Greater Toledo conducted a two-year study to explore ways to keep it open. Among the options was sharing the school with another faith group by holding secular classes together and religious classes separately. The number of Jews in the Toledo area is down from 7,500 in the 1970s to fewer than 4,000 today, but Jewish officials said there are more than enough local kids to populate the school.

Museum Saved

WARSAW — The museum at the Nazi death camp at Sobibor will remain open after the Polish government stepped in following the museum's June 2 announcement it would close due to lack of funding from the regional government. Poland's culture ministry said the museum will stay open and be run by the museum at the nearby Majdanek death camp. In January, the Sobibor facility is to become an independent state museum funded by the culture ministry. About 20,000 people a year visit Sobibor. Some 250,000 people, mostly Jews, were killed there in the Shoah.

Palin Sports Star

NEW YORK — Former U.S. Republican vice-presidential candidate Sarah Palin visited New York tourist spots wearing a large Star of David around her neck.Palin, who visited the Statue of Liberty and Ellis Island June 1, said she wore it in honour of Jerusalem Day, but observers said she did it to drum up support among Jewish New Yorkers for a 2012 presidential bid.

Attack on Chassid Called Hate Crime

NEW YORK — The lawyer for a chassidic man badly burned during an alleged arson attempt in a New York chassidic village is asking the U.S. Department of Justice to investigate the incident as a hate crime.

Rabbi David Twersky

The May 22 attack in the village of New Square was "evocative of the Ku Klux Klan and Nazi Germany," lawyer Michael Sussman said in a recent letter to Attorney General Eric Holder, New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo and state Attorney General Eric Schneiderman.

Aron Rottenberg, 43, suffered third-degree burns over more than half of his body when he confronted a man who was carrying a bottle of flammable liquid behind his family's house in the early morning.

Police later arrested Shaul Spitzer, 18, on charges of attempted murder, attempted arson and assault. Police say Spitzer was trying to set fire to Rottenberg's house.

Tensions are high in the Rockland County village, where the vast majority of residents pray at the main synagogue, led by the grand rabbi of the Skverer Chassidim, David Twersky. Rottenberg and others who pray elsewhere have suffered harassment and violence.

Spitzer is reportedly a live-in butler for Rabbi Twersky, who has condemned the attack.

In his letter, Sussman described the situation as, "Obey the Grand Rebbe or face harassment, violence and expulsion."

Toronto man gives a gift of life

Eager to help in any way he could

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

When Nathan Disenhouse's friend, Jonathan Grossman, was diagnosed in 2009 with a rare blood cancer called myelofibrosis, Disenhouse was eager to help in any way he could.

With Grossman in desperate need of a bone marrow transplant, his family organized a bone marrow donor drive at Adath Israel Synagogue to find a genetic match.

Grossman's drive attracted 1,457 people who provided a cheek swab, with Disenhouse and his wife among those who provided samples.

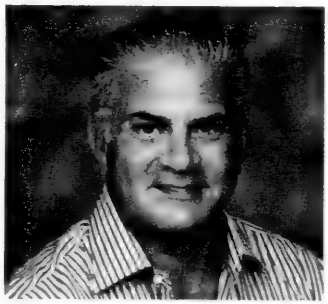
"My wife and I went to give a swab, and we forgot about it," Disenhouse said.

Despite finding a match, Grossman passed away later that year from complications from chemotherapy.

After mourning the loss of his friend, Disenhouse's decision to register himself with the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation was a distant memory – until he got a call in January informing him that he was a potential match for someone else.

After agreeing to do some preliminary blood work to confirm the match, Disenhouse got the unlikely news.

"When I was called and they told me I was a match, I was kind of over the top and I said, 'Wow, this is really happening,'" said Disenhouse, 52, the owner of Natel Management and Financial Services, a risk management company that provides clients with death benefit coverage.



Nathan Disenhouse

The first thing he did when he learned of the development was call Grossman's widow, Julie.

"I felt like I had to let her know that I might be able to help somebody else through the effort we made for her husband," he said.

Gift of Life, a Florida-based international public bone marrow, blood stem cell and umbilical cord blood registry, had matched Disenhouse with a 61-year-old man suffering from non-Hogkins lymphoma.

Since Gift of Life was founded in 1991 by leukemia survivor Jay Feinberg, the organization has registered about 185,000 donors, and more than 2,300 transplants have been conducted.

Feinberg was moved to start the registry when he was told that his best chance of finding a genetic match was through his own ethnic group – Ashkenazi Jews.

Striving to change the world

Last month, The CJN visited the Peres Center for Peace in Jaffa. The centre is the "child"of Israeli President Shimon Peres. Indeed, it is his ben z'kounim (child of his old age).

A doting parent, Peres has invested a great deal in the centre. As with most parents, his aspirations for the centre soar like wings carrying prayers heavenward. And like most children, the centre bears the imprint of the parent: it has ambitious hopes for eventual peaceful coexistence between Palestinians and Israelis.

Founded 15 years ago, the centre's mission, its raison d'être, is to try to build a foundation for peace between Palestinian and Israeli societies from the ground up (my emphasis). The centre strives to plant seeds of trust between individuals. The hope, if not quite the plan, is that one day, those individual seeds will grow, mature and flower into a self-sustaining, everyday-replenishing orchard of respectful, civil relations between Israeli and Palestinian societies at large.

From the editor's desk...

The people who work at the centre take a long view of their work. They reject resignation and the defeatist shrug of the shoulder that to most Israelis are but rational reactions to the daily news.

"We are great believers in the human being," the centre's director general Ron Pundak told The CJN. "Eventually, change [coexistence and co-operation] will happen because it is the deep interest of both Israeli and Palestinian nations."

The centre's staffers are prepared to wait – considerably – to measure the success of their work, at least one or two generations.

Their willingness to wait stems from the fact that so much of the centre's programming involves Israeli and Palestinian youth.

The photo inset is typical of the centre's far-reaching potential for good, Tami Hay-Sagiv, director of the sports department, told The CJN. It shows Israeli and Palestinian girls at a football (soccer) camp that was actually held three years ago in Nova Scotia. It was no coincidence that Nova Scotia's ranking cabinet member, Defence Minister Peter MacKay, is part of the photo.

"Heritage Canada has been instrumental in supporting the girls football program for the last five years," Hay-Sagiv said. "Without the support of Canada, we couldn't really have a girls program.

"About 100 girls take part in the centre's sports programming. It is a real success story. The girls stay in the program on average for five to six years, and they generally remain friends. You can see the evidence on Facebook," Hay-Sagiv enthused.

In all, about 1,500 children from the ages of five to 17 participate in the Twinned Peace Sport Schools Program.

The "twinned" in the name derives from the fact that the program twins Palestinian and Israeli communities.

The Israeli communities are mostly from the relatively underprivileged former development towns of the south. The Palestinian communities are from the West Bank.

All the sports teams are mixed, i.e., Arab and Jewish. The children do not play against each other. They play with each other. They learn each other's language, the basic words of communication involved in the activity. There are also joint cultural activities for the children. "The key," Hay-Sagiv said, "is for the children to experience new things together."

The sports program is eight years old. It is one of seven broad categories of programs that bring individual Palestinians and Israelis together. The other programs are: Agriculture, Water and Environment; Business and Economics; Civil Leadership; Culture, Media and Arts; Medicine in the Service of Peace; and Youth Dialogue through Technology.

Of the lifelong lessons absorbed by the youngsters who take part in the sports programs, Peres has said, in his typically pithy, aphoristic manner: "No matter who you are, here is a world where you compete without hating, where you win without killing."

Encounters between the youngsters on the football pitch are a "good device for bringing about changes in attitudes among the children," Pundak pointed out. "It takes no time for them to ask the question: where were you these many years?"

The earnestness and dedication of the staff at the centre is impressive. They press on with their work despite what, in the main, they see or hear are contrary stories in the news each day. It is precisely because they want to change what they see and hear that they soldier on determined to create a new future reality. We wish them all success.

Laura Fixman
Intern

Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz; senior political correspondent for CNN, David Gergen; associate editor of the Washington Post, Bob Woodward, and U.S. President Barack Obama's former press secretary, Robert Gibbs, had a lively debate at a Toronto synagogue recently.

The four speakers touched on such topics as speeches about the Mideast conflict made by Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, events in Egypt and Libya, and the 2012 U.S. presidential election in front of a full house at Beth Tzedec Congregation on May 31. The panel was sponsored by the 2011 Spirit of Hope Benefit of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

As to what wins elections, the four panel members agreed that domestic issues are of more importance to the average voter.

Dershowitz said that the creation of jobs will be the most important issue in the next election, and that international issues are always decided on domestic issues.

"Even Israeli elections are turned on a domestic issue," he said.

Gibbs agreed that domestic issues are important, but added that the assassination of Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden would have an effect on voters. He said for that short period of time, everyone, regardless of his or her political opinions, feels more confident about their country. He added that it was a positive change after months of debates on where the president was born.

"It injected a note of needed seriousness," Gibbs said.

Woodward said that uprisings in Egypt, Libya and other Mideast countries have the potential to define Obama's presidency, the way Sept. 11 did for George W. Bush, and that the situation in these countries can blow up at any moment.

"All of the situations in these countries are like powder kegs," Woodward said.

But he added that voters will care more about the fact that they don't have a job or that they can't afford things.

"He [Obama] has got to hook into the average person's struggles," Woodward said.

Dershowitz touched on this topic when he spoke about the fact that democracy doesn't always improve situations in countries such as Egypt or Libya.

"We don't know whether democracy in Libya will be better than the status quo," Dershowitz said.

He said westerners think countries ruled by democracies will be in favour of American values, but that isn't always the case.

Gibbs spoke about the importance of battling poverty and creating opportunity in the Middle East. He said that the revolution in Egypt was not only about getting the right to vote for a leader, but also about getting better opportunities for themselves and their children.

But Dershowitz gave well-educated and wealthy suicide bombers as an example of why raising the standard of living may not help the political situations in Mideast countries. "It's not a guarantee of peace if you educate people," he said. "There's not a one-to-one correlation between wealth and peace."

The speakers all had slightly different interpretations of Obama's recent speech about Israel.

Gibbs said Obama reaffirmed the United States' commitment to Israel. He said that his speech "endorsed a qualitative military advantage for Israel," by saying that Palestine must be a demilitarized state.

Dershowitz said the Israeli-Palestinian conflict couldn't be resolved unless both sides made what he called "wrenching sacrifices." He added that Israelis should realize that they can't hold on to certain settlements, and that the Palestinians need to give up on their right of return.

Gergen thinks that Obama shouldn't have made his speech about the Mideast conflict when he did (May 19). He said it was done to head off the UN vote in September on the issue of Palestinian statehood, but that it wasn't a good time or place (at the State Department in Washington, D.C.) to give a speech.

"They could have done this in a much more productive way," Gergen said.

Woodward said it's important to learn from the mistakes of the past to inform the choices of the future and that people should pay for their sins of the past.

"By not looking to the past, we guaranteed that never again would happen again and again and again," Woodward said.

Academic confident about Israel's security

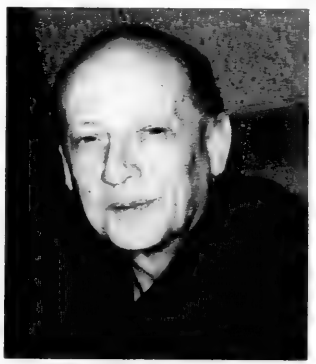
Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Gabriel Ben-Dor is a glass half-full kind of guy when it comes to evaluating Israel's strategic situation.

When he examines the key elements that go into determining the country's security position, he sees a wealthy nation with a booming economy, a strong currency, high-tech developments of all kinds, membership in the OECD, low unemployment, low debt, a strong sense of patriotism, over-subscription to army fighting units and more.

So when he's asked about this or that threat, he replies with some measure of confidence that Israel has the wherewithal to meet those challenges. "Israel has built in capabilities to deal with different situations," he said.

Ben-Dor, director of national security studies at the University of Haifa, was speaking June 1 before about 30 people at a lunchtime lecture at the law offices of Minden Gross. The event was sponsored by Advocates for Civil Liberties and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association.



Gabriel Ben-Dor

Speaking on the political and economic aspects of Israeli security, Ben-Dor said Israel must address this issue while balancing costs versus results. No country, let alone Israel, can afford unlimited security outlays.

Israel must strike a balance between security spending versus the cost of other important social needs. A country's security status should also include consideration of its standard of living, he suggested.

On his basic message – that no country can devote unlimited resources to security – he noted that Israel's best economic performance correlated to its lowest defense expenditures. In the last 10 years, the country has devoted 6.5 to 7.7 per cent of its GDP to national security – it's even lower today, at around 6.25 per cent – "and the economy of Israel is booming."

Ben-Dor said Israel should continue to follow "the system" set out by David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, to ensure its national security.

Among the eight points referenced by Ben-Gurion were: using military force to repel existential threats; developing a qualitative edge in armaments; maintaining better educated and trained manpower; developing "a superb system of intelligence"; deterring aggression by making it too painful for its foes; to "go for the jugular" in armed conflict and aim for a decisive victory; maintaining nuclear ambiguity, and make friends with those who are also at odds with Israel's enemies, like India, Turkey, the Druze and Kurds.

In a question-and-answer session and in an interview with The CJN, Ben-Dor was more specific. Asked about the impending international flotilla – which includes a ship financed by Canadians – that will attempt to run Israel's blockade of Gaza, Ben-Dor called it "a provocation to heat up the political climate."

Israel is working diplomatically behind the scenes to persuade organizers to abort their attempt to enter Gaza by sea. He said there is no need to do so if the organizers are genuinely interested in providing supplies to Gazans. There are procedures in place – through Israel, Egypt or even Cyprus – to make that happen, he said.

"I think they're trying to embarrass Israel. I don't think it's really bona fide."

Ben-Dor said Israel is well within its rights to blockade Gaza. "International law recognizes blockades for countries at war, and Hamas admits it."

Asked about the international criticism Israel receives, particularly from Europe, Ben-Dor suggested leaders of Britain, Italy, France and Germany are "on good terms" with Israel. The OECD, largely controlled by Europeans, recently admitted Israel to its club because they saw "sufficient benefit to Europe."

Public opinion, he acknowledged, is anti-Israel, particularly on campus and in trade unions. However, that may be changing as Europeans increasingly worry about large Muslim populations in their midst who refuse to assimilate.

"Fear of Muslims" are turning many in Denmark, France, Italy, Britain, Holland and Belgium to "a more understanding of Israel's point of view."

Asked also how Israel can deal with enemies that don't even value their own lives, Ben-Dor said it must determine their weakest point and attack it. That means "hit the leaders who make the decisions in their pockets. Deny them resources."

If that doesn't work, then "targeted assassinations of people who initiated massacres of civilians" are in order, similar to what the United States did to Osama bin Laden, Ben-Dor said.

CELEBRATING ISRAEL (DAY)

The pathology that destroys dreams

A condition of permanent pathology grips the Palestinian people: an inbred, across-the-board aversion to truth. Ever since the Mufti of Jerusalem travelled to Berlin in World War II to join in propagating the Nazis' genocide of the Jews, Palestinian leaders have cultivated and then preyed upon their own people's ignorance. Now, a fourth generation of Palestinians suffers for the cynical manipulations and prevarications of their leaders and the leaders of the Arab world. The result has been to leave them functionally blind, incapable of seeing the myriad possibilities for their own advancement, as well as historically illiterate, unaware of the actual events that have brought them to their present situation.

And so, in rhyming complement to nakba day, when Palestinians are told to take to the streets to bemoan the founding of the State of Israel, their leaders this year added "naksa" day, on June 5, to publicly remonstrate against the anniversary of Israel's victory in the 1967 Six Day War.

That both anniversaries were the result of Jews defending themselves against life-or-death aggression aimed at them by Arab armies does not register in the minds of the nakba-naksa protesters. Aggression directed at Jews is simply part of the moral order of things in the Middle East. But Jews defending themselves is itself violence upon the aggressors' inverted moral code and a stain upon the Arab coat of honour.

Hundreds of protesters in Syria attempted on Sunday to overrun the border with Israel near Majdal Shams. Syrian TV reported that up to 23 protesters had been killed by IDF fire and more than 300 wounded in the resulting clashes. The IDF denied that it had killed anyone. Similarly, hundreds of Palestinians took to the streets near Qalandiyah, between Jerusalem and Ramallah. But no casualties were reported there.

"Like any country in the world, Israel has the right and obligation to guard and defend its borders," Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week, well in advance of the impending naksa day protest.

Especially after the violent incursion at the very same spot in the Golan on nakba day last month, Syrian leaders knew that Israel would take all reasonable steps to defend its border. In fact, they were counting on it, certain that the ensuing violence would distract world attention away from the ongoing massacre and murder they were perpetrating against their own people. And yet, again, the Palestinians allowed themselves to be so derisively exploited and abused by the Syrians.

The pathology that infuses Palestinian society is pushing further away the dream of an independent state of their own, coexisting, of course, alongside the State of Israel.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israel immediately summoned its ambassador to Vienna home for consultations after Kurt Waldheim was elected president of Austria. Waldheim, a former UN secretary general, had been accused of war crimes, but he denied taking part in Nazi atrocities, despite having been a German army officer in World War II.

Farber's candidacy in Ont. election (1)

Letter writer Michael Orr is upset that the former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, Bernie Farber, has decided to enter the political arena ("Neutral leadership to partisan position," May 26). He suggests that a person in Farber's position, coming from a non-partisan organization, should not be permitted to run for political office.

If we subscribed to Orr's thinking, Canadians would not benefit from the excellent pool of people from the Jewish community willing to stand for political office. For example, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, former president of CJC and one of Canada's greatest parliamentarians, would never have graced the halls of the House of Commons. Former president of B'nai Brith Canada, Conservative Rochelle Wilner, would not have been allowed to run against Liberal Ken Dryden in the 2008 federal election, and Michael Mostyn, the immediate former director of government relations for B'nai Brith Canada, would have been forbidden to challenge Liberal Monte Kwinter in the upcoming Ontario provincial election.

Orr's thinking is flawed. Farber is a skilled, honest and decent man. Frankly, that Farber wants to enter the sometimes thankless world of Canadian politics should be applauded, not rebuked.

Bernie Farber has made the rumours official and is running for Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty's Liberals in my riding of Thornhill in the Oct. 6 election ("CEO takes leave after 27 years with Congress," May 26). Farber's career with Congress developed from his first job in 1984 as a advocate at Queen's Park to secure government funding for Jewish day schools. McGuinty has steadfastly refused to address the issue of inequality in the funding model and is comfortable with the status quo of full funding for his faith's Catholic schools while other communities pay education taxes to fund Catholic schools and struggle to find the private funding for their own children's education of choice. In your article, Farber states that "while the premier and I may disagree on this subject, I'll have the opportunity to speak inside the tent and try to effect change." I would remind your readers that Monte Kwinter, a Jewish MPP for McGuinty's Liberals, also supports more equality in education funding, yet has been unable to convince McGuinty to fairly address the issue in his many years in the Liberal caucus.

The Quebec model of 60 per cent funding for all non-public schools of all faiths is a reasonable compromise. The province funds general studies while families pay for religious and cultural studies through tuition. It is clear to me that change from within is extremely unlikely – in fact, any support for McGuinty suggests that to his supporters this issue is not important and that our community is easily divided.

Dundee didn't boycott Israeli goods

Dundee City Council has never boycotted any goods or services from Israel ("Israeli books banned in Scottish municipality," June 2). Reports in the media that Dundee has banned Israeli books from its libraries and boycotted Israeli goods and services are completely untrue. This misunderstanding has arisen after a policy decision by another Scottish council, not Dundee City Council.

Comedy night sponsors

I would like to clarify the sponsors of the Young Professionals Comedy Night with Joel Chasnoff. The article "A Jew walks into a bar… mitzvah" (Heebonics, May 26) stated that the event was a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto event, but it was actually co-sponsored by 15 organizations, including various synagogues from across Toronto, as well as federation's Community Connect and Impact Toronto. All organizations were equal sponsors of the event. The event was intended to be an example of the entire community working together in unison toward a common goal, rather than each organization creating competing events. So often, we are focused on our individual organization's success that we forget that we are one community. For a complete list of sponsoring organizations, please visit www.fiveminutesoffame.org.

The fallout from a Palestinian declaration of Statehood

Alan Baker

The international community has recently witnessed a series of widely publicized and authoritative declarations voiced by Palestinian leaders, according to which "the current peace process as it has been conducted so far is over" [Palestinian Authority Foreign Minister Riad Malki, March 22], and "the Palestinian leadership institutions [Palestine Liberation Organization and Fatah] have decided to submit a request to the United Nations for recognition of a Palestinian state within the 1967 borders, with its capital in east Jerusalem" [Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat – AFP news agency, March 20].

These declarations join an earlier plan by PA Prime Minister Salam Fayyad, announced in August 2009, to unilaterally declare a Palestinian state upon completion of the preparations for Palestinian governing institutions by September 2011.

In the face of a probable U.S. veto of any further attempts by the Palestinian observer delegation to the UN to attain a Security Council resolution recognizing a Palestinian state, the Palestinians are aiming to bring about the adoption of a "Uniting for Peace" resolution in the September 2011 session of the UN General Assembly. This resolution would be based on a procedure established in 1950 at the initiative of then-U.S. Secretary of State Dean Acheson in the context of the Korean crisis as a means of overcoming a lack of unanimity among the permanent members of the Security Council, which was preventing the council from fulfilling its duty to maintain international peace in the event of a perceived "threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression."

A General Assembly resolution adopted through the "Uniting for Peace" procedure would not provide the General Assembly with any powers beyond the recommendatory powers that it exercises in any other routine resolution. It would not be a mandatory resolution, but could only recommend collective or individual actions by states. It would not have the power to change the status of the territories, nor, in and of itself, to alter Israel's status vis-a-vis the territories.

The projected action by the Palestinians of declaring void the agreed-upon negotiation process, and proceeding to a unilateral process with the approval of the UN, could have a number of very negative consequences for the Palestinians and for the peace process, as well as for the international community. The following list suggests merely some of those consequences.

On the Palestinians

• The Palestinian action would be a clear violation of the assurance given by PA president Yasser Arafat in the first formal contact between Israel and the Palestinians, in his exchange of letters with Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin in 1993, according to which "all outstanding issues relating to permanent status will be resolved through negotiations." By leaving the negotiating table, taking unilateral action, and seeking to have the UN impose an outcome on Israel, the Palestinians are in fact undermining the very basis of the "peace process" and of Arafat's commitment.

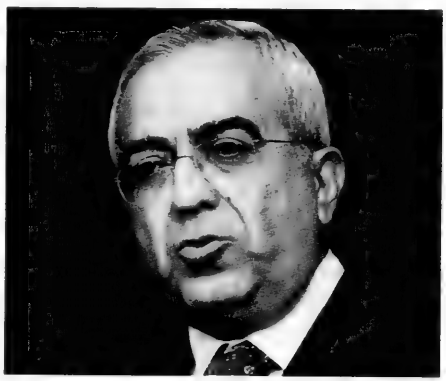
• The Palestinian action would be a clear violation of Article XXXI (7) of the 1995 Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement, by which the parties undertook not to "initiate or take any step that will change the status of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip pending the outcome of the permanent status negotiations." Since there is not yet any outcome to the permanent status negotiations, the Palestinian unilateral action runs directly against this commitment and renders it void, and as such opens up the option for Israel to undertake its own unilateral actions regarding the status of the territories, should Israel consider this to be necessary.

• In generating a fundamental breach of the interim agreement, the Palestinians would be responsible for this agreement's demise. Since the agreement serves as the legal basis and source of authority of the PA itself, its institutions, its parliament, courts, the office of its president, the president himself, and all powers and responsibilities, the PA leadership would, in fact, be placing in question the very legitimacy of its own existence, with all that that would imply.

On the peace process and the international community

• The Palestinian action of seeking to impose a solution through the UN would be incompatible with the terms of Security Council Resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973). Resolution 2424 specifically calls upon the parties to agree upon "secure and recognized boundaries," and thus, by implication, not to impose boundaries outside such an agreed process. Further to this, Resolution 3385 calls for "negotiations... between the parties concerned... aimed at establishing a just and durable peace in the Middle East."

• By seeking to bypass these resolutions through action in the UN with the support of the international community, the Palestinians are basically obliging the member states of the UN to remove the foundations from the entire peace process, which are based entirely on those two resolutions, as stated in all the agreements and memoranda signed between the parties and witnessed by members of the international community. It is questionable if the members of the international community could agree to be party to an action undermining such central and important Security Council resolutions that they themselves initiated and adopted.



Salam Fayyad

• Bypassing and voiding resolutions 242 and 338 would also have consequences on the yet-to-be-conducted peace negotiations between Israel and its neighbours Syria and Lebanon, by removing the central factors around which such peace negotiations are intended to take place.

• The precedent that this will create could have serious consequences for the credibility of other Security Council resolutions that determine outcomes of other disputes in the world, and render such resolutions completely voidable at the whim of any group of organizations or states that can recruit a majority in the General Assembly.

• Since the leaders of the United States, European Union, Russia, Norway, Egypt and Jordan are signatories as witnesses to the 1995 interim agreement, it may be asked how such states could support a Palestinian action in the UN that is clearly intended to undermine and frustrate that agreement. What value would there be to states and organizations signing as witnesses to important international documents if no credibility, reliability or integrity are attached to such witnessing?

For Jerusalem

The international community has consistently refused to recognize Israel's right to establish its capital city in Jerusalem pending a negotiated agreement on the status of the city. Hence, diplomatic missions are not located in Jerusalem, Israel's capital. In light of this, one might ask how member states of the UN will be able to support a Palestinian resolution affirming a Palestinian right to establish its capital in Jerusalem.

This would be a clearly one-sided act by the international community in violation of all declarations and commitments directed toward a negotiated settlement regarding Jerusalem. Furthermore, it would undermine the commitment between Jordan and Israel in Article 9 of the Jordan-Israel Peace Treaty, according to which: "In accordance with the Washington Declaration, Israel respects the present special role of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan in Muslim Holy shrines in Jerusalem. When negotiations on the permanent status will take place, Israel will give high priority to the Jordanian historic role in these shrines."

On the refugee issue

Similarly, if, as the Palestinians have been intimating, they will seek to include a provision in a "Uniting for Peace" resolution affirming and imposing the right of return of the Palestinian refugees, this would, in fact, conflict with the relevant provision of Resolution 242 calling for "achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem." Assuming that the "refugee problem" refers also to the issue of Jewish refugees resulting from the Middle East crisis, then the unilateral determination regarding Palestinian refugees only would be discriminatory and violate Resolution 242.

It would also violate the relevant undertakings in the Oslo accords, specifically the 1993 Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements (Article V(3)) that determines that the final status issues to be negotiated (and not imposed by the UN) "shall cover remaining issues, including Jerusalem, refugees, settlements, security arrangements, borders, relations and co-operation with other neighbours, and other issues of common interest."

Imposing a UN determination regarding the refugee issue would be incompatible with and undermine the agreement between Jordan and Israel in Article 8 of their 1994 bilateral Treaty of Peace, according to which the refugee issue will be dealt with "in negotiations, in a framework to be agreed, bilateral or otherwise, in conjunction with and at the same time as the permanent status negotiations."

The potential confusion, disorder, and substantive damage of a Palestinian-motivated UN resolution – to the Palestinians themselves, to the peace-negotiation process, and to the credibility and reliability of the UN and international community in general – is likely to be immeasurable. While the beginnings of such a process might be clear, there can be no foreseeing the final outcome and the concomitant consequences.

The question remains whether the members of the UN who are being drawn by the Palestinians into this irresponsible and ill-advised exercise are fully aware of the damage it may cause.

Alan Baker, director of the Institute for Contemporary Affairs at the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, is a former legal adviser to Israel's Foreign Ministry and former ambassador of Israel to Canada. He participated in the negotiation and drafting of the various agreements comprising the Oslo accords.

How open is our tent?

I don't believe that Jeffrey Wiesenfeld ever anticipated that he would carry the day. And he surely didn't anticipate the firestorm his victory would set off. Wiesenfeld, of course, is the member of the board of trustees of the City University of New York, and the firestorm was triggered by his persuasive argument that Jewish American playwright Tony Kushner should not be awarded an honorary doctorate at CUNY's John Jay College of Criminal Justice June commencement.

CUNY, for years known as "the poor man's Harvard," is the public university system of New York City, currently serving almost half a million students. For more than 160 years, it has provided superb education to students who couldn't afford private tuition. It has a special place in the hearts of many New York Jews, who remember it as the university of choice for immigrants and their children when our parents and grandparents sought to better themselves.

In conferring honorary doctorates, universities publicly recognize people who have made significant contributions to society – though volunteerism, philanthropy, or cultural and professional accomplishments. In early May, CUNY's board of trustees convened to approve a slate of honorees proposed by the faculty. While in past years the trustees had rubber-stamped such slates, Wiesenfeld objected to Kushner's inclusion, describing him as an extreme critic of Israel, citing quotations from Kushner interviews that anti-Zionist Norman Finkelstein had mounted approvingly on his website.

The trustees voted against the proposed list of honorees. Then, removing Kushner's name, they approved it, voting to table Kushner's award until their next meeting, months after the June commencement.

I first read about what came to be called "l'affaire Kushner" the day after the trustees met, on a slew of higher education e-newsletters. Within a day, the New York Times began covering it. The overwhelming sentiment in these publications was outrage: politics have no place in the awarding of honorary doctorates; political "litmus tests" are a form of McCarthyism that have no place in a democratic society; Kushner's academic freedom was violated, and the academic freedom of those who put forth his name was stifled. One Yeshiva University professor wrote to CUNY asking to return the heretofore "cherished" honorary doctorate it had awarded her several years earlier, because she doesn't wish to be associated with an institution that "demeans" academic freedom.

Some columnists took aim at the decision-making privileges of academic trustees, one referring to them as "know-nothings and yahoos in governing universities whose commitments and obligations they do not begin to understand." And, in many columns – and particularly on anti-Zionist websites – the trustees' action was offered proof that the powerful pro-Israel camp silences all criticism.

A smaller number of columnists and bloggers defended the trustees' right to select honorees on the basis of a wide range of considerations. They faulted the "academic snobbery" of some of their colleagues and argued cogently that no one's academic freedom is violated in the awarding or withholding of honorary doctorates. Several noted that, like Wiesenfeld, they took issue with Kushner's views on Israel (although they faulted Wiesenfeld for relying only on out-of-context remarks mounted on a propagandist website without Kushner's authorization).

Sara R. Horowitz

Even so, they described the board's exclusion of Kushner as "dumb," "inept," "unconscionably stupid," "bozos" – in short, a strategic fiasco. Kushner's name was put forth in recognition of his oeuvre as a playwright, but overnight, he became, as one blogger put it, a "martyr for free speech." Within a week of the trustees' meeting, a special session of its executive committee overturned the decision, voting to award Kushner the honorary degree after all. And while the whole incident might have initially been about writing and art, it's surely now perceived as the triumph of Israel's critics over their silencers.

Five years ago, Brandeis University also conferred an honorary doctorate upon Kushner, to the objections of many alumni. There, too, the university cited Kushner's accomplishments in the arena of culture and refused to allow his politics to be a barrier.

Perhaps because, as a professor of literature, I see the natural role of artists to be irritants, gadflies and critics who go against the grain, I can't find it in me to object to honouring Jewish artists. I like to think our tent can be expansive enough to contain even those who discomfit us.

Artistic creativity and interfaith co-operation

Christianity, like Judaism, regards the Hebrew Bible as Holy Writ. But the two traditions interpret the texts very differently. There's also a fundamental difference in the position and importance assigned to the books of Scripture. For example, the Torah, the first five books of the Bible so central to Judaism, is of lesser significance in Christianity.

To this very day, for most Christians the Torah reflects the "religion of law," which they identify as obsolete Judaism and assume to have been superseded by Christianity, the "religion of love" as hinted at by the Hebrew Prophets and manifest in the New Testament.

Similarly, the Book of Esther (which Jews know as the Megillah), although it doesn't even explicitly mention God, is very popular in Jewish tradition. By contrast, it's of minor significance in Christianity. The book may indeed be a work of fiction, not a historic account of an incident in ancient Persia, but this in no way diminishes its significance for us.

Its purpose is to show how Jews, when once again exposed to prejudice and mortal danger, were rescued by what they perceived to be divine intervention. A Jewish woman named Esther, the new queen of the realm, was the agent. Despite the vulgarity of the contest that brought her to the palace, the purpose of her being there was noble. The happy outcome deserved a celebration: Purim.

Both the traditional Christian distance from the book and the Jewish embrace of it are relevant to our understanding of the significance of the current exhibition at the

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

Kelly Library at St. Michael's College in Toronto. Instead of seeking to judge it from the standpoint of Christian theology, the Megillah is viewed here as a significant document in Judaism. The display may be understood as an earnest attempt at outreach, consistent with the college's commitment to Christian-Jewish understanding.

Having been on staff there for many years, I can testify to the seriousness and the depth of this commitment. Thus the president of St. Michael's, Sister Ann Anderson, has herself for many years taught courses on Jewish worship intended to bridge the gap between the two faiths and to promote a better understanding of Judaism among Christians. She has also taken groups for extended study periods in Israel and often visits the country, where she has many friends.

As reported in The CJN last month, the exhibit consists of a recently completed illuminated manuscript in the form of a traditional scroll of the full text of the book. Its creator is Laya Crust, a Toronto-based and internationally recognized artist. Although the 32 colour illustrations that frame the text are in the Persian style of the 16th century, as a way of stressing continuity and relevance, many of the characters depicted are recognizably contemporary. The result is a multi-layered modern visual commentary on an ancient text made accessible to Christians no less than to Jews, even though it's written in Hebrew.

Female scribes, particularly in the Orthodox community to which Laya Crust belongs, are rare. However, hers isn't a feminist agenda, but the fruit of pure artistic creativity to be viewed and admired.

The only possible feminist aspect of the book is the story of Vashti, the queen who was banished because she refused to appear at the king's drinking orgy "wearing a royal diadem to display her beauty to the peoples and the officials." Esther, who came to replace her, got to the palace via a beauty contest and other tests that are inimical to feminist thinking.

Yet it's Esther who's the heroine of the story, because in the critical moment, she saves her people by exposing Haman, the man bent on liquidating the Jews. Although God may not be mentioned in the book, divine providence permeates it. Throughout history, many individuals have, despite themselves, been the agents of a higher calling. Esther was one of them.

The Scroll has been commissioned by Rabbi Shalom Schachter and his wife, Marcie Gilbert. Christians and Jews alike have every reason to be grateful for their initiative. It will not only enhance their own Purim celebrations, but give the Jewish and Christian communities a sample of a very impressive contemporary fusion of artistic creativity with interfaith co-operation.

The exhibition runs until June 18 at the John M. Kelly Library, 113 St. Joseph St. in Toronto. It's well worth a visit.

Assad promises reforms and shoots

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

It began with a whimper and may yet end with a bang. The civil unrest that has convulsed Syria since mid-March originated in the somnolent town of Dara'a, when security forces arrested a group of high school students who had scrawled anti-government graffiti on a wall. In protest over their incarceration, their parents and relatives marched to a government building demanding their release. The students, who most probably were galvanized by the popular revolutions in Tunisia and Egypt, were eventually released. But by then, it was too late.

The protests in Dara'a – a poor, flyblown burg near the border with Jordan – touched a raw nerve, spreading to the rest of Syria and mutating into a national protest movement that now poses a grave threat to President Bashar Assad's authoritarian Baathist regime.

The protesters, aided by such social networking sites as Facebook, Twitter and YouTube, were demanding an end to martial law – enacted in 1963 following a coup by the Baath party – and calling for multiparty democracy, freedom of expression and assembly, a free press, an independent judiciary and human rights.

Emboldened by his concessions, some Syrians are even demanding the resignation of Assad, a 45-year old ophthalmologist who promised to institute political and economic reforms after succeeding his father, Hafez, in the summer of 2000.

Ten weeks after its eruption, the rebellion simmers and brews, boiling over on Fridays during Days of Rage demonstrations across the country. More than 1,000 protesters have been killed and 10,000 arrested, says the Syrian human rights organization Sawasiah.

The death toll would have been much higher had Assad followed in his late father's footsteps. Responding to an Islamic revolt centred in the city of Hama in the winter of 1982, Assad senior unleashed the full might of the army, levelling neighbourhoods and killing upwards of 20,000 of its residents in a campaign of retribution unprecedented in the annals of the modern Middle East.

Although the uprising was quashed, permitting Hafez Assad to continue ruling Syria arbitrarily in dictatorial fashion, the grievances festered.

Bashar, one of his sons, inherited his mantle. A man who previously appeared uninterested in politics, he pledged to transform Syria, a nation that has squandered its scarce resources jockeying for prominence and influence in the Arab world and fighting its arch-enemy, Israel.

Having promised to foster openness, Assad tolerated a climate of reform, dubbed the Syrian Spring. Private discussion groups sprang up in cities such as Damascus, Homs, Aleppo and Baniyas. The press was granted a modicum of leeway and new newspapers emerged. Petitions demanded the abolition of the state of emergency and the release of political prisoners.

Playing the role of a reformer, Assad was receptive to cosmetic changes, but nothing more. Indeed, he let it be known that western-style reforms were not in the cards. As he put it in his inaugural address, "We cannot apply the democracy of others to ourselves."

In essence, Assad – a member of the minority Alawite community that France favoured during the colonial period – sought to reform a stagnant and repressive system without relinquishing his iron-fisted control.

Above all, his goal was to preserve the primacy of the Baath party, whose platform glorifies Arab nationalism and unity and socialist economic policies.

Being a faux democrat, Assad soon extinguished the so-called Syrian Spring, clamping down hard on dissidents. In defence of the withering crackdown, his spokesmen claimed that reformers had abused the freedoms he had so kindly granted them and that they had attempted to sabotage the regime.

In what was taken as a definitive pronouncement, Assad's vice-president declared that economic reforms took precedence over political ones. Assad was and is an admirer of the China model of reform, which emphasizes the trickle down effects of prosperity at the expense of genuine political rights. Hewing to this template, Assad ushered in an era of economic progress, enabling private banks to be established and computers and cellphones to proliferate.

Politically, however, Assad had no patience for real change, which in practice meant that Syrians were mired in the antediluvian past, oppressed by draconian emergency decrees and regulations greatly circumscribing their right to vote, assemble or express and publish opinions contrary to the party line.

Syrians courageous enough to flout the stultifying status quo were dealt with harshly by the feared secret police.

Assad, having succeeded in repressing open dissent, thought he was immune to the turbulence that began blowing across the Middle East last December. In an unmistakable sign of his hubris, he told the Wall Street Journal that Syria lay "outside" the arc of crisis. "We are not Tunisians and we are not Egyptians," he asserted in a now embarrassing observation.

For a while, though, he was correct. So deeply embedded is the culture of fear in Syria that a Day of Rage in Damascus on Feb. 4 failed to attract any demonstrators. But 100 Syrians showed up at a peaceful candle-lit vigil near Egypt's embassy in support of Egyptian protesters.

Initially, Assad tried to fob off the protesters. Mindful of the upheavals in Tunisia, Egypt, Yemen, Jordan, Bahrain and Libya, Assad announced a 17 per cent pay raise for two million civil servants, hoping this gesture would persuade them to stay off the streets.

But after protests broke out in Dara'a and spread to Syria's main cities in contagion-like rapidity, Assad blamed the unrest on Islamic fundamentalists, criminals and even Israel, declaring that his first priority was stability. He has since adopted a carrot-and-stick strategy, promising reform while instructing his security forces to shoot demonstrators.

Bashar Assad

Iran, which crushed a homegrown rebellion in 2009, has rallied to Assad's side, sending trainers and advisers as well as riot gear and surveillance equipment.

In a bid to placate critics, Assad has replaced his cabinet and prime minister, sacked a regional governor, fired local officials, instructed the government to draw up a plan of reforms, closed Syria's first and only casino, permitted an Islamic party to create a satellite TV channel, and granted citizenship to Kurds. Most significantly, he has ended the state of emergency. Last week, he issued a general amnesty regarding political prisoners.

These concessions have neither mollified Syrians nor stemmed the tide of revolt because they are so shallow. The point to remember is that Assad, backed so far by the armed forces and the Sunni merchant class, maintains a monopoly on power.

Assad intends to tough it out, U.S., Canadian and European Union sanctions notwithstanding. Assad's cousin, Rami Makhlouf, a wealthy businessman, has suggested he will go down fighting rather than resign.

He is probably not bluffing. Assad does not want to find himself in the same humiliating position as Mubarak, who faces imprisonment and perhaps even execution.

But stunts such as sending scores of Palestinian refugees to breach Israel's border on the Golan Heights on Nakba Day can only provide a temporary distraction. Assad's day of reckoning is surely approaching.

Teen receives Duke of Edinburgh's Award

Laura Fixman
Intern

Nina Fainman-Adelman, 17, had to face her lifelong fear of dogs while working toward a Duke of Edinburgh's Gold Award.

The award, founded by Prince Philip, Duke of Edinburgh, is presented to Canadian recipients by the Governor General. Given to young people aged 14 to 25, the award recognizes personal achievements in the categories of physical fitness, community service, skill development and adventurous journey.

Fainman-Adelman said that although her adventurous journey, a dog-sledding trip through Algonquin Park, was difficult because she was facing her greatest fear, it was also very rewarding.

"It was a huge relief," Fainman-Adelman said. "It gave me the perspective to face my other fears."

Nina Fainman-Adelman

Fainman-Adelman heard about the award from a friend shortly before she turned 14. She began the bronze level of the award, as early as possible, at 14, and received the gold on the earliest possible date, on her 17th birthday. She said she has changed a lot since she began the process for the bronze level of the award three years ago.

"It gets you out of your box," she said. "I learned that high school is about exploring many different opportunities."

At the awards ceremony last month, Fainman-Adelman was chosen to give the thank-you speech on behalf of all the recipients. She was nervous about speaking in front of Gov. Gen. David Johnston, but she found it was a positive experience to meet him.

"Even though he's in such a high position, he could connect to everyone," she said.

She doesn't know many people who are aware of the Duke of Edinburgh's Award, but she wants to tell other young people about it because she thinks it's something they should try for. Working toward the award would especially benefit people who focus only on their grades, she said.

"It's about enjoying the journey, and not just about having something nice to put on your resumé," Fainman-Adelman added.

After completing the bronze and silver levels of the award, Fainman-Adelman wanted her activities for the gold award to be more challenging. She said that in addition to facing her fear of dogs, she challenged herself in the physical fitness category by earning her brown belt in karate. She also ran for president of her high school, North Toronto Collegiate, this year, and she credits the Duke of Edinburgh's Award with giving her the courage to do that. She found that she enjoyed what she did for the gold award more than what she did to get the bronze or silver.

"I felt that everything I did to get my gold was more meaningful to me," she said.

One of Fainman-Adelman's dreams is to attend Oxford University to study law. She said that since the Duke of Edinburgh's Award is well-known in England, having received one might give her an advantage when applying to law school. She would like to attend Queen's University for her undergraduate degree. But, she said that the award helped her realize that there is more to life than getting good grades to get into the right university.

"Before I was stuck in a certain plan I had for my life," she said. " This award helped me open up to different possibilities."

The best part about the awards ceremony for her was a chance to be among other young people who have had amazing accomplishments and to be recognized by the British royal family, she said. She added that she owes her achievements to her supportive family and friends.

"There were a lot of people who backed me up," she said. "They were very important and helped me overcome a lot of obstacles."

GENERATIONS MEET: Students in grades 4 and 5 at the Leo Baeck Day School welcomed their grandparents and special guests to the school as they participated in the L'Dor V'Dor project sponsored by the school's Nachas Club. Several weeks ago, students e-mailed black and white scanned copies of family photographs of previous generations that were digitally scanned and printed on a canvas. Grandparents were invited to take part in a hands-on art project along with their grandchildren that included drawing portraits of each other which will be mounted on the canvas. 'If I can save a life, I'll save a life'

He soon realized that Jews were not well represented in the existing registries and quickly moved to remedy the situation.

While Feinberg found a donor four years later and made a full recovery, his commitment to facilitating matches for other cancer patients has never wavered.

Disenhouse, who is involved with a number of Jewish organizations – serving as the president of the Jewish National Fund in Toronto; as a member of the board for Camp Ramah; and as an investment committee member for the Reena Foundation – said that the idea of a Jewish bone marrow registry resonated with him.

After giving Disenhouse the option to back out of the process, Gift of Life sent him information about the two options – stem cell or bone marrow donation – and the side effects and risks associated with both.

Disenhouse, who opted for stem cell donation, said the decision to go ahead with the process was a no-brainer.

"If the shoe was on the other foot, I would hope someone would be there for me. But I know of a lot of people who have been found to be matches and don't go through with it for whatever reason. I said, 'I'm a healthy male, thank God… and if I can save a life, I'll save a life.'"

In April, he was flown to New York City, put up in a hotel and registered at the New York Presbyterian Hospital: Cornell Weill Medical Center for a physical and pre-screening.

Once he received a clean bill of health, Disenhouse was visited every day for a week in his hotel room by a nurse who administered injections of Neupogen, a drug that increases the production of white blood cells.

The drug mobilizes stem cells to travel from the bone marrow into the bloodstream. Through a process called apheresis, the stem cells are collected by putting the blood through a cell-separating machine that filters out the stem cells, which are then infused in the recipient.

Disenhouse said that except for receiving the Neupogen shot once a day for a week, leading up to the donation, he and his wife were free to explore New York City.

Disenhouse said the actual donation, which took seven hours, was the easiest part of the whole process.

"When you get these Neupogen shots, you realize how it takes over your body. It's an anti-cancer drug. It's what a cancer patient would get [to increase his/her white blood cell count]."

He said the main side effect he suffered from was stiffness in the lower back, but it wasn't anything that immobilized him.

"I figured that whatever was happening with my body, it was part of the process… I wasn't too worried," he said.

"The only nervousness I felt was, 'What if I go down for the physical and there is a problem?' Because once you're scheduled to do a physical, they start prepping the patient."

Preparing a patient to receive the donation requires destroying the patient's existing immune system using chemotherapy and radiation, which in itself can be fatal.

"So if you back out, he's toast," he said.

Disenhouse, who doesn't know anything about the recipient besides his age and ailment, said if the opportunity ever presented itself, he would love to meet him.

While he realizes that privacy laws will most likely prevent him from meeting him, he would just like to find out how he's doing.

"I'm curious about how it went and I hope to find out next week. That will satisfy me from the point of view that it worked."

He said it is customary that donors bring get-well cards for the recipients which are delivered to them by Gift of Life staff.

As the JNF Toronto president, Disenhouse felt it was appropriate to give the recipient a certificate that said 18 trees were planted in Israel in his honour.

Although Disenhouse understands that people might be nervous about donating bone marrow or stem cells, he insists "that there is nothing to be afraid of," and that Jews have "an obligation to step up to the plate and do what they can."

But the recipients of the donations are not the only ones receiving a gift, Disenhouse added.

"The rabbis tell me, 'now you're going to go straight to heaven,'" he said with a laugh.

הנס של תיאטרון המפגש

להצלחה כאן יש פנים מאד ברורות:

גליה סרנר, ראש הדסק הישראלי, שבשקט, מאחורי הקלעים השיגה את תמיכת המוסדות, והיתה הכוח האמיתי מאחורי היכולת למלא שלושה אולמות.

וכמובן, במאית הבית , יעל פיינגולד, שמגיעה ממונטריאול לחודשים ארוכים כל שנה ומצליחה לעשות נסים עם קבוצת מתנדבים. חלק גדול בהצלחתה של יעל נעוץ ביכולתה הנפלאה לשלב בין מספר מצומצם של שחקנים מקצועיים (דתי פרידמן, אודלי בתר, אריק אינגר ודפנה צור) ושורה ארוכה של שחקנים חובבים מוכשרים וחדורי מוטיבאציה.

שוש קבסה הוציאה מן הצופים דמעות של צחוק כרווקה הנצחית שמתייצעת במגיד העתידות. חיים נובאק הרשים בתפקיד המשעשע של הערבי של שבת שבא להוציא את הנחש מקנקן המים, ומיכה בוצר כגבאי בית בכנסת שמאיר את השכונה לתפילת סליחות. מאוד ריגשה את הקהל עירית בוחניק היפה, כזונה הירושלמית שמגורשת מן העיר על ידי הדב הקדוש.

אבל שישאר בינינו.

Jewish apps

There's no slowing down the number of Jewish and Israeli apps being released for the iPhone, iPad and iPod Touch. Here are some new ones I'm enjoying that are free or cheap. They can run on all three devices unless noted otherwise. And some have been optimized for the iPad's larger screen.

Jerusalem Post (free) – Israel's most famous English-language newspaper (finally) has its own app. There's a lot of excellent free content here, along with the opportunity to purchase premium content. And where else would you find a newspaper app whose content is divided into major categories, including Opinion, Jewish World, Lifestyle, Iranian Threat, Features and Sports? I do wonder why the Post didn't take the opportunity to launch a version optimized for the iPad. [http://bit.ly/jhapp1]

Israel Hayom (free) – This Hebrew language paper is available for iPad only. You get a complete paper at your fingertips – in full colour with striking graphics and a traditional newspaper experience. Each page fits on the screen, and with a couple of strokes, you can enlarge the font size to make it very legible. Even the ads looking amazing. [http://bit.ly/jhapp2] And you can enjoy Israel Hayom online even if you don't own an iPad. [http://bit.ly/jhapp3]

Special Prayer ($.99) – There are plenty of siddurim, real and virtual, available but not too many have the prayers you'll find in this app: "18 unique daily prayers that were chosen with the intention of providing you with the most relevant meaning to your personal wishes." They include a prayer for longevity, a prayer for finding a wife/husband, a prayer against the evil eye, a parent's prayer and, conversely, a children's prayer for their parents. The interface is slick with the prayers presented in Hebrew, English and phonetic (transliterated) Hebrew. [http://bit.ly/jhapp5]

Mark Mietkiewicz

Tanach Bible ($1.99) – Veteran Jewish software companies Redlex and Davka have teamed up to produce an excellent electronic Tanach. It works fine on an iPhone but shines on an iPad's larger screen. You can display text in the original Hebrew next to the English translation or alongside the classic commentary by Rashi. The search function lets you look for the occurrence of any word anywhere in the Tanach in English – and in Hebrew, if you have that language activated on your device. A print function would be nice, but the app is well worth the price. [http://bit.ly/jhapp8]

Israel Flights (free) – Another app that has a modest goal and delivers on it very well. Get status information about all flights en route to or departing Ben-Gurion Airport. The app seamlessly collects data from all relevant airlines – along with weather information at the destination – and presents it in a logical format. [http://bit.ly/jhapp9]

Finally, I want to once again give a big thumbs up to http://JewishiPhoneCommunity.org . As new Jewish apps are being released, this is the site to visit to find software for your iPhone and iPad, as well as for your Android and BlackBerry-based phones and tablets.

Do you have a favourite Jewish or Israeli app? Tell me about it and I may mention it in a future column.

Reaching us emerging adults

In my synagogue, the place to be is Tot Shabbat. The attraction isn't singing Bim-Bam, the animated stories told by the energetic leader, or the adorable parade of stuffed Torahs. The draw is the social scene. As parents stand in a circle around the tots, invitations are extended for Shabbat lunch, plans are made for Saturday-night pizza, and notes are compared on movies and sports. Tot Shabbat is the social hub of the synagogue.

Jewish education is tied to life's stages. Youth movements, summer camps and day schools cater to adolescents. Hillels and Birthright attract college students. For young families, nurseries, playgroups, and Tot Shabbat engage both children and their parents.

Tying programs to age cohorts works. We build community and affinity with those with similar experiences. Having a high school crush, choosing a university, cramming for finals, child rearing, and caring for aging parents are profound events that bind together those who experience them concurrently.

Cohorts and life events, however, are changing faster than our community. As one example, federation young adult divisions target people ages 25 to 40. A generation or two ago, when there was a seamless movement from college to marriage to parenthood, this grouping worked, uniting individuals undergoing similar stages in life. Today, demographics have changed. More Jews are attending graduate school and engaging in other experiences between college and career. The average age of marriage has risen, as has the age of child bearing. The differences between a 25-year-old and a 40-year-old have been exaggerated by demographic and cultural shifts.

Class Act

Daniel Held

This is where I lie, in a cohort boxed out of Hillel and Birthright, but without children to take to Tot Shabbat. Jeffrey Arnett, a researcher in psychological development, calls us "emerging adults." Our experiences differ from those in cohorts younger and older. We are post-college, young professionals or graduate students, single or married without children, establishing our first home outside a dormitory or our parents' house. Attending events with college students is infantilizing, and we won't allow bedtimes and babysitters to dictate our social calendar.

There are a variety of programs to reach out to this cohort. Birthright's alumni community, Toronto's JUMP – the Jewish Urban Meeting Place, and a number of synagogue efforts seek to reach emerging adults. While these are important efforts, the hodgepodge of programs needs to be buttressed by a systemic shift in understanding emerging adulthood. Just as we think systemically about the Jewish, educational, and social needs of teens, college students and young families, we also need to consider the unique need of emerging adults.

We are seeking community on our own terms, often outside the framework of existing institutions. We are more likely to go to a class in a friend's living room than in the synagogue. We want our voice to be heard, but cannot pay the entry fee required by many committees. We want to merge our Jewish community with our social network, our Jewish lives with our postmodern living.

Tot Shabbat is fun, but it's alienating for emerging adults. While the lackadaisical may say "they will return when they have children," pragmatism forces us to re-engineer our thinking to address this new stage in active and creative ways that will establish a continual pathway of Jewish involvement from college to emerging adulthood to young families.

Hillel's Socalled concert

Hillel Ottawa partnered with Barrymore's nightclub on May 20, to help support a Jewish musician who is on tour to promote his most recent CD.

Josh Dolgin, who goes by the stage name of Socalled, is a fusion artist whose work is heavily influenced by klezmer, the traditional music of Ashkenazi Jews. But he blends his hip-hop stylings with classic klezmer, as well as drum and bass, and ultimately, he will try and incorporate any musical genre he can think of – and then throw something on top of that.

As for the lyrics, some of them make reference to Jewish traditions. Socalled's second album, released in 2005, was called The So Called Seder: A Hip Hop Haggadah. The artwork on this album is a piece of matzah rotating on a record player, and it represents one way Socalled attempts to embody his Jewish roots through his music. For this album, Socalled partnered with the eclectic combination of Theodore Bikel and rapper Killah Priest.

Socalled recently released his brand new album, SleepOver, and then began touring. When the Ottawa show was being planned, Hillel was given the opportunity to partner with World Famous Music, an Ottawa music promotion company.

Alexandra Izso spearheaded the event for Hillel – she had a connection with a promoter from World Famous Music who let her know of the upcoming show. As soon as she heard about it, she decided to pitch the idea to Hillel. The rest is history.

The Hillel students who attended the show were privy to a style of concert that can only be described as unique. Asher Farber, a recent graduate of the School of Music at the University of Ottawa, was one of the Jewish students who attended the event at Barrymore's.

On Campus

Justin Dahan

Jewish musicians in this day and age are something of an enigma. "There are Jewish musicians who have established a great following among Jewish youth, such as Matisyahu or even the emerging Maccabeats," Farber said, "but Jewish youth need to continue to demonstrate their interest and appreciation for upcoming Jewish music and culture."

The show itself, Farber said, was more than just music. "His show included jokes, Yiddish rhetoric, Jewish-style melodies, and even magic tricks."

This event helped open the eyes of Jewish students in Ottawa to a new genre of music, something that has mixed a new-school sound that they are accustomed to with a mix of Jewish music that their ancestors listened to.

Some may not have been prepared for such a radical mix of music. "I thought it was a weird mix of music. The genres kind of clashed," said Dan Goldstone, a British student who spent the past year at the U of O on exchange.

Socalled's style of music is not for everyone, as it's a cacophonic combination of various genres, although those who are fascinated by it tend to genuinely enjoy it. Bringing these types of events to Ottawa and the Jewish student population helps to broaden the horizons of the students who go to them.

Together, we are stronger

Every day of my life is an exciting one. I am eager to wake up and see what I can do to make myself a better person and the world a better place. These days, however, there is another reason that I am even more excited: the Vancouver Canucks are in the Stanley Cup final.

When I moved to Canada, I became a big hockey fan. Living first in Montreal, I was a fan of the Montreal Canadiens.

In the yeshiva where I was studying, there was always a sense of excitement during the hockey season. Guy Lafleur used to live across the street from the yeshiva, and it was always "an event" when we saw him driving out of his garage in his fancy car.

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Then, when I moved to Vancouver, I became a Canucks fan.

I was thinking recently about a possible connection between the book of Bamidbar (Numbers), which we began to read recently, and hockey. Could there be any link between them? And, if so, what can we learn from it?

The book of Bamidbar begins with the counting of the Jewish people. Whenever the Jewish people were counted, they gave out a certain coin, and by counting the coins, one would know their precise number. Once, in the time of King David, the people themselves were counted directly – not by coins – and a great plague ensued.

Even today, when we count individuals for a minyan or the like, we don't count "one, two, three…" but rather, we say the words of a verse containing 10 words through which we will know the number of people present. Why do we have this practice of not counting people directly?

Rabeinu Bahya (in mid-13th-century Spain) explains that when people are included in a group, they have the merit of the entire group and are thereby strengthened and protected. When an individual becomes separated by being counted directly and individually, then he is on his own, and he must rely on his own deeds and merit. Even when we pray for sick people, we always include the individual with the entire nation by saying, "betoch she'ar cholei Yisrael" (among all the sick of Israel), so that they may have the healing strength and merit of the whole nation.

The same principle applies to hockey or any other team sport. We are part of a team, and our success depends, in large measure, on our encouraging and supporting one another.

In an interview, Roberto Luongo, the Canucks' goaltender, said that even though he had made some mistakes during the last series, he always received words of support from his teammates and coaches, which encouraged him and provided him with the desire to continue playing as well as he possibly could.

Although we are individuals, unique and separate, our strength lies in our being part of a greater whole – the Jewish People. Rather than standing out and apart from the community, let us join together as one people, putting our differences aside, and thus enjoying the blessing of all B'nai Yisrael as we move forward performing God's will.

Jewish themes dominate at book awards

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Six books on Jewish themes were honoured at the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards last week, and while that is fewer than in most previous years, the 23rd annual ceremony seemed to achieve a new level of maturity and to reach further beyond the Jewish community than ever before.

One reason may be that the Koffler Centre of the Arts-hosted event was held in a substantial city venue – the spacious and well-appointed Bram and Bluma Appel Salon of the Toronto Reference Library – as opposed to the Jewish institutional spaces of previous years, thus giving it a patina of cultural relevance for a much wider audience.

Also, it didn't hurt that comic author and raconteur Michael Wex, himself a former prize winner for his nonfiction book Born to Kvetch, was the wry master of ceremonies. Wex's Yiddish-inflected witticisms added immensely to the evening's entertainment quotient, as did Brian Katz's richly coloured musical segues on keyboard.

But it was the distinctive excellence of the prize-winning books and authors that really made the evening shine.

Tarek Fatah, whose book The Jew Is Not My Enemy: Unveiling the Myths that Fuel Muslim Anti-Semitism (McClelland & Stewart) won the Politics and History prize, received a strong ovation for his rousing political comments about the dangers of Islamofascism and the rush of many nations to bully and condemn Israel and the Jewish people.

Antisemitism today "is far more a danger to the rest of humanity than it ever was in Hitler's worst time," Fatah said. "Because today we are dealing with nuclear bombs in the hands of a people who believe in life that comes only after death. And that is why I wrote this book."

The prestigious fiction prize went to Alison Pick for Far to Go (House of Anansi), a Holocaust story focusing on an affluent and secular Jewish family in Prague. Raised as a Christian, the now-Jewish Pick explained that she found out by accident that her father was Jewish, that her great-grandparents had died at Auschwitz, and that her grandparents came to Canada and began a new life that didn't include Judaism. "This family secret has informed my entire writing career," she said.

Judie Oron, author of Cry of the Giraffe (Annick) which won in the Youth Literature category, told an equally amazing and dramatic story as a screen beside her displayed two photographs of her adopted Ethiopian-Jewish daughter, Wuditu, taken "before and after slavery." As she tells in the book, Oron went to the war-torn country and bought the child out of slavery with "a few tattered, dirty" bills of Ethiopian currency.

Robert Eli Rubinstein won in the Holocaust Literature Category for An Italian Renaissance: Choosing Life in Canada (Urim Publications), a memoir of the physical and spiritual rejuvenation of his parents, Hungarian survivors of the Holocaust.

Harold Troper took the Jewish Scholarship prize for The Defining Decade: Identity, Politics, and the Canadian Jewish Community in the 1960s (University of Toronto Press), which traces the "blooming" of the Jewish community in the decade when it reached its maturity, and fully engaged with the national community at all levels. Hy Bergel, who gave the award to Troper, described the book as "a compelling history, presented with energy, clarity and purpose."

Charles Foran, a journalist and author of eight previous books, won in the Biography and Memoir category for Mordecai: The Life and Times (Random House Canada). Foran, who is not Jewish, said one of the most challenging aspects of the project lay in "getting both the basics and the essentials of Judaism right." He thanked editor Louise Dennys as well as the late Richler's wife and children for their invaluable assistance.

The evening also included a poignant tribute, delivered by Wex, to the late Chava Rosenfarb, the last of Canada's original generation of post-war Yiddish writers, who died in 2010.

Lesbian artists to speak at Darchei Noam

Laura Fixman
Intern

Gabriella Goliger's Girl Unwrapped is a novel about "Toni Goldblatt's taboo desires conflicting with the expectations of her Holocaust-scarred parents," her website says, "and the conservative mores of her time."

Gabriella Goliger

Goliger, along with musician Justine Appel and filmmaker Barbara Center, will speak at an event called Proud, Jewish and Lesbian: Expressions Through Art, on June 12 at 7:30 p.m., at Congregation Darchei Noam in Toronto.

Girl Unwrapped is set in Montreal in the 1960s, when Goliger grew up, but that isn't the only reason she chose to set the book in that time period. She said she wanted to show the difference between the conservative early 1960s and the liberation that happened later in the decade.

"I wanted to revisit that time, re-examine it and bring it alive," Goliger said. "A lot changed in such a short time."

Although Goliger has much more in common with her main character, Toni, than being a Jewish lesbian, she worked hard to make sure Toni was different than her. She said that Toni has a lot more difficulty keeping herself hidden, which, for artistic purposes, makes her a better character.

"In terms of the agony in feeling almost like you're born absolutely wrong, I can say I went through that," Goliger said.

The response to Girl Unwrapped has been positive so far, with favourable reviews and good feedback from readers she's met. She attributes that to everyone being able to find something to relate to in her novel about the struggles of growing up.

"I've had people who are neither Jewish nor lesbian tell me they can relate to this book," Goliger said.

When she spoke about her book to a group of elderly Jewish women, she wasn't sure how they might respond. They ended up being very interested and gave her a very warm welcome.

"I took it as a sign of how much the world has changed on the topic of gay identity," she said.

Goliger is working on a new book set in Palestine in the 1930s and '40s, about a young Jew who falls in love with a British policeman. She said in some ways it's more difficult to write than Girl Unwrapped was, because she never lived during that time, but in other ways, it's a lot easier to write, because the subject matter isn't as personal.

"I struggled with writing Girl Unwrapped," she said. "The subject matter was very close to home so I had to work to find a certain distance."

Goliger said she gained confidence after finishing Girl Unwrapped, her first novel, because she no longer had to figure out how to write a novel.

Even if her first novel hadn't been as successful, Goliger said she doesn't write for money or success. "I do it because I feel like my life won't have meaning unless I keep doing the things I have passion for," Goliger said.

She didn't intend to write Girl Unwrapped with a particular message, but she said that the book's message is positive. She said it shows how the "other" is also "us," and by doing that, it breaks down barriers within communities.

"It heartens me to see that Jewish communities and other communities are opening up to embrace those who once felt excluded, and I want to be part of that process," she said.

Proud, Jewish and Lesbian: Expressions Through Art is sponsored by the Jewish Diversity Committee of Darchei Noam, in co-operation with Kulanu Toronto. For more information, go to www.darcheinoam.on.ca. To learn more about Gabriella Goliger, visit www.gabriellagoliger.com.

Gay Israeli Arabs seeking asylum here, lawyer says

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Canada continued to accept refugees from Israel last year, but one immigration lawyer says almost none of those granted asylum were Jews and most were Israeli Arabs facing persecution for their sexual orientation or for refusing to take part in terror attacks.

Figures obtained by The CJN from the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) show that of 484 refugee claims from Israel finalized last year, 56 were approved – an acceptance rate of 12 per cent.

The acceptance rate from Israel the year before was just five per cent.

The IRB rejected 324 claims in 2010. The rest were abandoned or withdrawn.

Ottawa's acceptance rate for refugees from Israel has been dropping steadily since 2005, when it was 31 per cent.

The IRB doesn't release reasons, whether political or religious, for granting asylum, but Toronto immigration lawyer Guidy Mamman says "virtually all" those from Israel who win asylum in Canada these days are non-Jews.

That's in stark contrast to years past, when this country granted refugee protection to Jews from former Soviet republics who immigrated to Israel, then springboarded to Canada, a favourite destination.

Through the 1990s, these claimants typically alleged that while in Israel, they faced discrimination and were denied jobs and housing, even threatened and harassed, because of mixed marriages or questionable status as Jews.

Canada's acceptance of these claimants led to friction with Israel, which argued that as a multicultural democracy, it did not produce refugees. Israel said such claims were spurious and designed simply to gain entry to other countries.

But the days of former Soviets seeking asylum here are over, Mamman said.

Now, "it's mostly Arab males resisting terrorist activities" and who have Israeli citizenship, he said.

He said refugee claims from Israel generally fall into three categories: Arab men, whether Muslim or Christian, fleeing pressure to carry out terrorism; Arab males based on sexual orientation, and Arab females who are in "problematic" relationships, including marrying outside their clan, those who spurn arranged marriages, or who are in a same-sex relationship.

Gay Arab men "aren't alleging persecution," Mamman noted. "They're terrified of returning."

Other Arab males "can face tremendous pressure to participate in terrorism, especially those who can pass for Jews." Any Arab who sells land to Jews or is even suspected of collaborating with Israel can face grave danger if returned there, Mamman said.

There are still some Israeli Jews who claim refugee status in Canada, "but for reasons that are not related to fear of persecution" if they're returned, Mamman explained. These can be Israelis who overstay their visits or face criminal charges back home. The law says they can stay in Canada pending a hearing, he said.

The board has a separate category of claimants from "Palestine." These claimants may have resided in the West Bank or Gaza.

IRB numbers on Palestine show that in 2010, 73 per cent, or 80 claimants of the 110 finalized, were granted asylum. The success rate in 2009 was 62 per cent.

Edward Corrigan, a London, Ont.-based immigration lawyer who handles claims from Palestinians, said most successful claimants have alleged they were pressured into spying for Israel, putting them at great risk, or fled Gaza because they were involved with the West Bank-based Palestinian Authority and Fatah movement.

The Israeli Embassy in Ottawa had no comment on the latest IRB figures.

Ottawa seniors mark bat mitzvahs

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — For five residents of the Bess and Moe Greenberg Family Hillel Lodge, it was definitely a case of "better late than never." In a moving and elegant ceremony, they all affirmed their commitment to living a Jewish life.

On May 22, the chapel at Hillel Lodge was filled to capacity for the bat mitzvahs of Bernice (Battia) Seward, Helen (Chaja) Trachtenberg, Shirley (Sheindl) Winer, Anne (Chana Sara) Bokhaut Koffman and Flory (Pemhilla) Benbaruk.

Family, friends and fellow residents watched with pride as each of these women – aged 79 to 91 – took part in a ceremony that didn't even exist when they were 12 years old, the traditional age when today's girls celebrate their bat mitzvahs.

The women had spent several months studying with Cantor Daniel Benlolo, who prepared them for this day and introduced each to those assembled.

Accompanied by music by volunteer keyboardist Aviva Lightstone, each woman was escorted into the chapel on the arm of a family member and took her seat at the front of the room. One by one, each read a favourite psalm – in English, French and Yiddish. They read a selection of prayers as well, and Benbaruk delighted the audience with a beautiful rendition of Yerushalayim Shel Zahav.

Following a candlelighting ceremony, the women stood under a large tallit held up by family members and received a blessing. All of the women were presented with a framed certificate of bat mitzvah before joining their family and friends for a reception.

Ballet star finds new home in England

Maureya Lebowitz
[David Cooper photo]

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After four seasons dancing with the Royal Winnipeg Ballet (RWB), Maureya Lebowitz is moving on.

She left for Birmingham, England, at the beginning of June and made her debut with the Birmingham Royal Ballet – better known to some readers perhaps by its former name, the Sadler's Wells Theatre Ballet – in a production of Coppelia on June 6.

At 21, Lebowitz is one of the youngest soloists in the history of the Birmingham Royal Ballet company. The other soloists, she noted, are all 10 to15 years older than her.

Lebowitz came to Winnipeg 10 years ago, at age 11, from her home in Montana to study ballet at the Royal Winnipeg Ballet School. She made her professional debut in the Nutcracker in 2001 and joined the company in 2007 as an apprentice. At 18, she became the youngest dancer in RWB history to perform the role of Juliet, in Romeo and Juliet. Over the past season, she was second soloist.

"I have always been interested in watching other companies and in pursuing other opportunities when the timing was right," she said. "Over the past few months, everything fell into place for my move to Birmingham."

Lebowitz herself started the ball rolling last fall after the RWB toured Israel, coinciding with the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's mission last November. (Lebowitz had been to Israel the year before on a Birthright Israel trip.)

With a couple of weeks of free time, she decided to go to England, catch some plays and ballet, and arrange some auditions. She tried out for the Royal Ballet, the English National Ballet and the Dutch Ballet in addition to the Birmingham company.

"I was a little nervous, as I was going to be dancing with dancers I have idolized," she said. "But once we started doing the warm-ups, I felt quite comfortable."

Lebowitz will have very little time to settle in Birmingham, because the ballet company was to leave on its first tour this week. The dancers were to perform in Manchester, then return to Birmingham in mid-June. At the beginning of July, the company will be performing in Ireland. After that, there will be a five-week break.

"Birmingham will be very different from the RWB," she said prior to her departure. "It will be a new challenge, one I am looking forward to."

At the same time, she expressed her appreciation for the RWB. "I was nurtured at the RWB and given incredible opportunities," she said. "It's thanks to the RWB that I am able to spread my wings."

She also values the many relationships she made in Winnipeg and at the RWB, in particular with ballet director Andre Lewis. "I look forward to coming back from time to time as a guest artist," she said.

Quebec daycare relgion ban challenged

The CPEs should not be regarded, the group believes, as part of the public school system, which was deconfessionalized in 2000.

"It would confuse my daughter if she were not allowed to talk about what she sees or does at home at her daycare," Jesion said.

Asked whether there is a justification for eliminating religious instruction from the CPEs, given that they have long waiting lists and those with a specific religious orientation are not likely to be the choice of families that do not belong to that religion, Jesion said these points must be balanced against all parents' equal right to government benefits.

"When a government decides to create a benefit, such as a subsidized daycare program, it cannot discriminate in the application or distribution of that program," he said.

The association represents 16 Jewish daycares with an enrolment of 2,875 children. It does not represent CPEs in the chassidic and haredi communities, nor private daycares that receive some government subsidization and are also subject to the directive.

A government website lists more than 30 CPEs located in synagogues, Jewish schools or other community institutions.

Sandy Jesion, right, announces a court challenge of Quebec's banning of religion in publicly funded daycares. With him, are Isabelle Couet, far left, and Danielle Sabbah.

The coalition says there are about 100 CPEs that have a religious orientation, including CPEs in the Muslim community. The CPEs rely on public funding for about 80 per cent of their budget.

The coalition's legal argument is based primarily on Section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which protects against discrimination.

It also cites the freedom of religion guarantee in Section 2(a), as well as the life, liberty and security guarantee in Section 7. Similar provisions exist in the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms.

"The Supreme Court of Canada has recognized that, in the parental context, the first of these rights includes the right to transmit one's religion to one's children," said the other co-chair, Isabelle Couet, a Catholic parent. "The second right includes making fundamental decisions about children's upbringing."

The coalition also says that the directive, which was issued by Family Minister Yolande James on Dec. 17, is "vague and arbitrary."

The new regulations mean the end of any educational activity the government considers to be the inculcation of a belief or dogma, or the practice of a specific religion. Cultural activities or symbols that are part of a religious tradition are permitted. For example, a Christmas tree or Chanukiyah may be displayed, but their religious origin or significance must not be taught.

The coalition says making the distinction between the religious and the cultural is difficult, and they wonder whether government inspectors are equipped with the knowledge to draw that line.

In fact, it says, CPE directors and educators themselves aren't clear on what conforms with the directive and what does not.

Danielle Sabbah, the association president, noted: "We can recount the story of Moses saved from the stream, but not recite the 10 plagues of Egypt against the Pharaoh, because that recitation supposes the miraculous intervention of God and that brings up faith... If I tell a child that Shabbat is special because God rested on that day, am I contravening the law?"

Federation CJA is supporting the challenge both morally and financially, said president Jack Hasen.

"We are doing this because our mission includes the key goals of representing and defending our communal interests and of ensuring the vibrancy of Jewish life in Montreal," he said.

"Along with the coalition, we believe that raising children to understand that daily life is inseparable from religious convictions is an essential part of Judaism as well as most other religions."

Arab Spring could spawn Islamist winter

Since the Arab world's revolts (not full-blown "revolutions," as they've largely been described) exploded on the scene more than four months ago, numerous articles have appeared questioning whether they will actually lead, as many in the West assume, to liberal democracy.

There's a world of difference between mere majority rule – which might result in a tyranny of the majority – and democracy with the protection of human rights for all. With rare and episodic exceptions such as Egypt in the 1920s and '30s, during which European models of constitutional democracy achieved limited success, Arab countries have traditionally been ruled by authoritarian regimes of one form or another.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Will the "Arab Spring" break this pattern once and for all and usher in a genuine freedom revolution? Even among the hopeful, there is deep concern that the prospects don't look nearly as promising as they did in the early days of the Tahrir Square protests in Egypt.

While liberal reformers in Cairo captured the hearts and minds of western journalists, they have not successfully organized for September's parliamentary elections. Nor do polls show that they command a popular base of support. By contrast, Islamists, both from the Muslim Brotherhood and the more extreme Salafists, are well entrenched and highly organized. By some estimates, these factions could capture more than 50 per cent of the seats. They could also be the dominant force to write a new constitution, likely reflecting their drive to inject traditional Islamic values in government, and eventually try to impose Sharia law.

Bernard Lewis

Muslim Brotherhood spokespeople claim to the West that they support liberal values of freedom, tolerance and pluralism – and even the protection of minority rights (foremost for women and Christians). However, the party platform (written in Arabic) reflects a different vision, consistent with the religiously traditional values of the majority of Egyptians themselves.

The PEW Center study of Egyptian political attitudes, released in late April, found that while a majority of Egyptians support multiparty elections, 62 per cent think the country's laws should "strictly follow" the Qur'an. Only 39 per cent give high priority to women having the same rights as men, and just 36 per cent think it's very important that Christians and other religious minorities enjoy freedom of religion.

During the past couple of months, New York Times reporters Michael Slackman and David Kirkpatrick have written in detail about threats from Islamists and Egypt's military (whose Supreme Council has ruled the country since president Hosni Mubarak's ouster) to liberal reform.

On June 1, Kirkpatrick drew attention to repressive measures military authorities have taken against those pushing for democratic freedom. This includes the arrest and torture of reform advocates; the sentencing of one such blogger to three years in prison; the forcing of female demonstrators to undergo humiliating "virginity tests" as a way of thwarting charges of sexual abuse by soldiers, and the intimidation and censoring of Egyptian journalists.

In a May 29 opinion piece in the Times, Prof. Timur Kuran argued that "viable Arab democracies... will not emerge anytime soon" since preconditions for democracy, including civil society and its institutions, are lacking in the region. Kuran drew attention to the deeper structural features inherent in Islamic-based Arab society, where "the concept of the [secular] corporation" is largely absent.

On this important but rarely mentioned subject, Malise Ruthven, a noted writer on Islam, commended (in the April 7 New York Review of Books) the following insight from Bernard Lewis, quoting from his recent book, Faith and Power: Religion and Politics in the Middle East.

"What is entirely lacking in the Middle Eastern political tradition is representation and what goes with it – the idea that people elect others to represent them, that these others meet in some sort of corporate body, and that that corporate body deliberates, conducts discussions, and, most important of all, reaches decisions that have binding force... this absence, derived from a feature of the Islamic Sharia law, which has no concept of legal personality, goes to the heart of the 'democratic deficit' of many Middle East polities, where family, tribe, coterie, or sect tends to subvert the authority of public institutions at the expense of civil society."

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Sisters honoured for 1946 graduation

Laura Fixman
Intern

The University of Toronto was a much smaller place in 1946 when Frances Blugerman and her sister, Marion Garmaise, graduated from the school of social work.

The sisters were honoured at a ceremony May 27 in Convocation Hall that recognized alumni celebrating the 55th to 80th anniversary of their graduation.

"There were graduates from all faculties, and some of them were over 100 years old," Blugerman said in a joint interview.

In their graduating class, there were 23 students, most of them women. Seven of the women, like Blugerman and Garmaise, were Jewish and originally from out of the province.

Blugerman said she came to Toronto because there were no social work schools in Winnipeg.

Garmaise said she wanted to go to a school of social work with a good reputation. A school of social work was opened in Winnipeg the year she left, but she chose to go to Toronto instead.

Both were happy with the quality of the education they received.

"We learned so much about people and social conditions," Blugerman said. "It's stayed with me to this day, and I'm 93 years old."

"We not only learned in the classroom, but we also learned a great deal in discussions," Garmaise, now 89, added.

After their graduation, the sisters took somewhat different paths. Blugerman quickly got a job with Jewish Family and Child Services in Toronto, where she helped find homes for orphans emerging from displaced persons camps in Europe. She also worked at Baycrest as the supervisor of central intake for social services for over 30 years.

She said she had no trouble finding a job. "At the time, social workers were very much in demand."

Blugerman was also one of the people interviewed in the film Children of the Storm by Jack Kuper, about the Jewish refugee children who came to Canada under the postwar Canadian Jewish Congress war orphans project. These were some of the children Blugerman helped at the beginning of her career.

Garmaise began her career at the then-Young Men's Hebrew Association (YMHA) and Jewish Family and Child Services, both in Montreal, where she also helped refugee children. She and her husband then went to Wales for two years and returned to Montreal, where she worked for the Jewish General Hospital and then taught at the McGill University school of social work for 19 years. They later moved to Chicago, where she continued as a hospital social worker at Mount Sinai Hospital. She currently lives in Toronto.

The recent ceremony here was conducted by Chancellor David Peterson. Blugerman described it as warm and charming. "It was very touching to be honoured in this way," she said.

Garmaise added that "it was very interesting to see how many women graduates there were, even in the '30s and '40s."

Both were pleased that their children, Trudy and Brian Blugerman, and Ian, Leslie and Cindy Garmaise, were there to express their pride in their mothers.

While in school, the sisters shared a room and a course of study. What Blugerman liked was that it was a positive environment to learn in, and she got to meet a good group of people.

"It was a very comfortable experience as a student," she said. "There were no problems."

Garmaise said she didn't feel terribly outnumbered as a Jewish woman there and she feels it was a much better experience than attending university in Manitoba for her undergraduate degree had been.

What she liked best about studying in Toronto was the fact that she was on her own and had the freedom to do what she wanted.

"Exploring the big city was pretty fun too," she said.

Claris Harbon

In addition to the financial prize, Trudeau Scholars benefit from the expertise of Trudeau fellows and mentors, accomplished individuals in both the academic and non-academic worlds.

Before coming to McGill for her doctorate, Harbon worked with disadvantaged groups in Israel, such as Jews of Arab origin, Israeli Arabs and Palestinians, and Ethiopians, as well as women and children.

Harbon is seeking to further social justice and change through the use of the law in innovative ways.

"Becoming a Trudeau Scholar is important to me as I am in the process of developing a voice within academia, and becoming a scholar in such an embracing and encouraging foundation is exciting," said Harbon.

Harbon was involved in the founding of Tmura, the Israeli Legal Centre Against Discrimination. She was also a founder of Itach, Women Lawyers for Social Justice, and she is a board member of Achoti, a feminist Mizrachi organization for underprivileged women.

"We are thrilled that Claris, an O'Brien Doctoral Fellow at our Centre for Human Rights and Legal Pluralism, has been nominated as a Trudeau Scholar. Her work on women's rights is innovative, comparative and deeply important in its exploration of civil disobedience and resistance to oppression in the everyday lives of women", said Colleen Sheppard, McGill law professor and the centre's director.

The independent Trudeau Foundation was established in 2001 to commemorate the late prime minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau by his family, friends, and colleagues. In 2002, the Government of Canada endowed the foundation with a donation of $125 million following a unanimous vote in the House of Commons. In addition, the foundation benefits from private sector donations in support of specific initiatives.

Grilling season starts now

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

I am hopelessly hooked on grilling. All year long actually, but especially from May until well into October. I adore the musky taste of food hot off the grill, kissed as it is by smoke on the outside, tender, juicy and moist on the inside. I particularly appreciate not having to turn on my oven during the summer months, keeping my house cool as can be.

The recipes that follow are simple and straightforward, packed with flavour and a minimum of fuss. The chicken burgers are great with or without the caramelized onion topping and the coffee brown sugar barbecue sauce is equally divine over chicken kebabs. Feel free to use chopped roma tomatoes in the salsa if you can't find cherry tomatoes. Happy grilling!

CHICKEN BURGERS WITH THREE KINDS OF ONIONS

Burgers
1 bunch green onions, sliced, white part only
1 large shallot, finely chopped
1/2 cup dry bread crumbs
1 tsp. dry mustard
3/4 tsp.each Italian herbs and salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1 egg
1 lb. ground chicken

Topping
1 tbsp. olive oil
4 large onions, sliced
1 tbsp. balsamic vinegar

In bowl, combine green onions, shallots, bread crumbs, mustard, Italian herbs, salt, pepper and egg. Mix in ground chicken until well combined. Form into 6 patties. (Patties can be covered with plastic wrap and refrigerated for up to 8 hours. Bring to room temperature for 30 minutes).

To make topping, heat oil in non-stick skillet set over medium low heat. Stir in onions and vinegar. Cook, stirring often, for about 30 minutes or until onions are softened and caramelized.

Place patties on greased grill over medium heat; cook, turning once, for about 12 minutes or until no longer pink inside. Serve topped with caramelized onions. Makes 6 servings.

GRILLED CHICKEN WITH TWO TOMATO AND AVOCADO SALSA

Salsa

1 lb. mixed yellow and red cherry tomatoes, halved
1/2 cup julienned oil-packed sun dried tomatoes
1 large ripe avocado, diced
3 tbsp. drained capers
3 tbsp. sherry vinegar
3 large cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. chopped fresh thyme
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
3/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1/3 cup olive oil

Chicken

6 skinless, boneless chicken breasts, butterflied
2 tbsp. chopped fresh thyme
1 1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. olive oil

In large bowl, combine cherry tomatoes, avocado and capers. In separate bowl, whisk together vinegar, garlic, thyme, mustard, salt and pepper. Gradually whisk in olive oil until emulsified.

Pour over tomato mixture, tossing gently until well coated. Mixture can be made ahead and stored at room temperature for up to 8 hours.

In small bowl, stir together thyme, salt, pepper and olive oil. Brush over chicken breasts. Cook on greased grill over medium heat, turning once, for 8 to 10 minutes or until no longer pink inside. Serve topped with heaping mound of salsa. Makes 6 servings.

MIAMI RIBS WITH BROWN SUGAR COFFEE BARBECUE SAUCE

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 large onion, chopped
4 cloves garlic, minced
1/4 cup packed brown sugar
1/4 cup chopped fresh coriander
2 tbsp. honey
1 tbsp. chili powder
1/2 tsp. cumin
1/4 tsp. hot pepper flakes
1 1/2 cups canned tomatoes, pureed
1/4 cup brewed strong coffee
1/2 cup chicken broth
1 tbsp. tomato paste
3 lb. miami ribs

In large heavy saucepan set over medium heat, heat oil. Add onions and garlic; cook, stirring, for 5 minutes or until softened. Stir in brown sugar, coriander, honey, chili powder, cumin and hot pepper flakes, stirring until sugar is dissolved. Pour in tomatoes, coffee, broth and tomato paste.

Bring to boil; reduce heat and simmer uncovered for 15 to 20 minutes or until reduced to 2 cups. (Can be covered and refrigerated for up to 4 days).

Place ribs on greased grill over medium high heat. Cook for 4 minutes. Brush with barbecue sauce, turn and cook for 4 more minutes brushing with sauce occasionally. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Is the "un" in unmarried the only difference? Property division comes of age.

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 30 years

Recently, it has become easier for many unmarried spouses to claim a share in their partner's wealth once the relationship dissolves. Ground-breaking decisions in the Supreme Court of Canada (SCC) in April have granted a substantial financial settlement to one of two unmarried couples and laid the groundwork for many others. A new system evaluating property rights upon "common law" marital breakdown has entered the world of family law.

In Canada, we are accustomed to a married spouse acquiring interest in their husband/wife's property after separation. Not so the unmarried partner. Such a partner is not automatically entitled to any property, regardless of substantial time residing with each other or having children. Ontario family law offers legal rights for the children of unmarried couples: spousal support may be available if a child was born after one year of cohabitation, or alternatively, three years of living together even without children. However, property division is not necessarily awarded in any situation.

Until the recent SCC decisions, these valuable property rights were acquired through evidence—linking the cash or efforts expended in direct relation to the specific item. For instance, unmarried spouses claim that they "deserve" financial benefit from the other's property because, for one, they have acquired the other's property or have improved the partner's property value—this argument applies to both the residential home and their partner's business. What type of evidence could they advance? Cash purchases, mortgage, utility or property tax payments, or any form of labour on the house — these factors could make them an "owner" in the property. This "unjustly enriched" argument would be advanced to demonstrate that the increase in property value occurred as a result of any or all such investments. A court order must be granted to give the partner the right to be considered an "owner" of the property, despite her name being absent from the title on the home or business.

Take the case of a common law spouse of 20 years who contributed to mortgage payments or to the down payment on the house, or contributed her time and labour towards its renovation or improvement. She must provide proof of how much she advanced or quantify the value of the services she provided to acquire a court order that would grant her a percentage interest in the home's value or the shares of the business she worked for or in which she invested (unregistered in her name). What's more, she would have no right to the value of her husband's successful contracting, professional or any other business, or to any of the shares of his RRSPs unless she could provide proof that she supplied services for that specific business and was not properly paid for those services. Without such evidence, the court would not typically factor in her contributions despite the fact that she was responsible for the lion's share of the domestic and child-rearing duties, thereby "freeing up his time" to generate substantial wealth.

Enter two significant cases in April of this year: Kerr v. Baranow and Vanasse v. Seguin. These judgments addressed the issue of contribution. In the Seguin case, the judge clearly and unequivocally stated how domestic participation is integral to financial success, and subsequently should be rewarded: "Mr. Seguin could not have made the efforts he did to build up his company but for Ms. Vanasse's assumption of these [household and child-rearing] responsibilities. Mr. Seguin reaped the benefits of Ms. Vanasse's efforts by being able to focus his time, energy and efforts on [his successful business.]" So the judge held: The common law wife was entitled to share equitably in the entire wealth of his property. In a nice turn of phrase, the judge called Mr. Seguin the "CEO of the finances" and Ms. Vanasse the "CEO of the kids". Meanwhile Judge Cromwell introduced a new term for these couples who aren't "couples" in the classic sense: "Joint Family Venture" has entered the legal lexicon.

The innovative term is accompanied by legal tests that the partner must meet to –qualify, but no longer does the court have to quantify the monetary value of duties like child-rearing or any other service in a lengthy union—especially if it is in relation to a specific property like a house or a business. The court now evaluates more subtle elements in the marriage: mutual efforts, economic integration, actual intent to share their wealth, priority in raising a family, as well as contributions each partner made to the wealth of the family.

Of course technical terms must be defined. The more sticky "intent to share their wealth" is determined by both conduct as well as explicit statements to that effect. Assessment of "contribution" to their wealth is evaluated by other factors not employed before: intangibles that broaden the ability of many unmarried women to make such claims as "contribution", especially after lengthy relationships. Most of these novel factors that the courts are now using emerge from housekeeping and child-rearing functions that contribute to the accumulation and development of wealth acquired by the other spouse.

Welcome to a brand new world. With the right evidence this recent SCC decision blurs the disctinction between married and unmarried couples in certain cases, especially after lengthy marriages in "traditional" relationships. The unmarried spouses whose names are not "on title" or on the shares of their spouse's business might now realize more rights than ever. For those considering moving in with a partner, it means proceeding cautiously, unless one has a Cohabitation Agreement which may protect those in the event of separation if it is drafted properly. Didn't get to the altar? The absence of that ring on your finger doesn't protect you quite as much anymore.

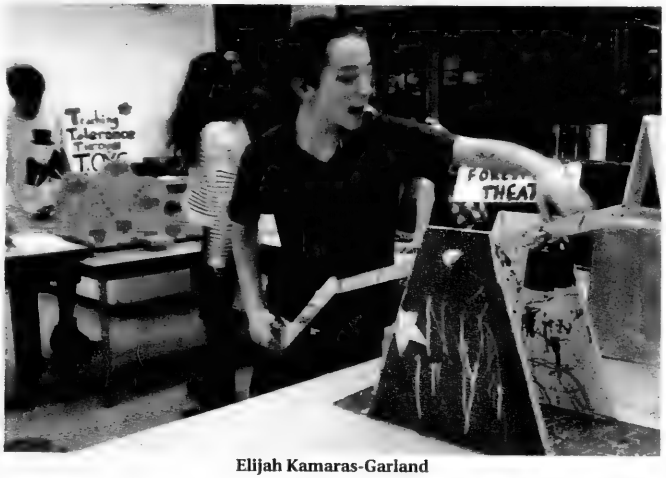
School toy project helps kids with special needs

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

More than 300 students from eight Toronto-area schools are creating toys and games for children with special needs.

The participating grade 5 to 9 classes are part of the Teaching Tolerance Through Toys campaign, which launched its third year in March. The program is part of an awareness project developed by the Zareinu Moveathon, an annual festival that raises more than $1 million dollars for the Zareinu Educational Centre.



Elijah Kamaras-Garland

"We're thrilled to see the campaign expanding into more and more classes in 2011," said Mitch Parker, principal and clinical director of Zareinu, a school and treatment centre for children with physical and developmental challenges.

"The enthusiasm and initiative of these students is an indicator that they can embrace a curriculum that includes learning about children with special needs. Enabling students to understand the challenges resulting from disabilities is the first step toward accepting these children as their equals."

The campaign provides students with a hypothetical case study about a child at Zareinu. It describes a disability such as autism spectrum disorder, Down syndrome or cerebral palsy and explains the challenges that a child with the disorder faces.

Through art, math, science or general studies, students must design a toy for their assigned case study. The step-by-step process includes investigating, planning, creating and evaluating the success of their toys.

The students also keep a weekly journal of their progress that incorporates their personal reflections on the experience. They will reveal their toys to the public at the Zareinu Moveathon festival on June 12 at Downsview Park.

"There's an incredible need for a program like this. It's an experience that participating students will remember for a lifetime," said principal Bill Waldman of Forest Hill Junior and Senior Public School, which is part of the program.

"This is a truly unique way of teaching a sensitive but critical topic. With bullying being a serious issue in our communities, this is one way of teaching students that we shouldn't fear or isolate those that are different."

Sonya Budd, Zareinu Moveathon coordinator, said the campaign "provides the opportunity for students to learn tolerance for their peers that are different from them. Whether the difference is physical or not, it teaches respect of others and acceptance of being different."

When the students arrive at Zareinu for a tour, the children "just blossom," she said. "The [Zareinu] therapists guide them on their projects and our students are so thrilled to have visitors that have brought toys for them to interact with. It happens to be incredible every time."

Budd said students at the participating schools have told her "they can hardly wait until next year when it is their turn to participate [in the program]."

At Forest Hill Public School's Grade 8 graduation two years ago, Budd was further reminded of how meaningful the campaign is. The valedictorian commented in her speech on the impact of the program and said it was "a highlight of her year."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

MRI may detect autism: Israeli scientist

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Autism and related developmental disorders may, in the coming years, be diagnosed in children as young as one year old using magnetic resonance imaging (MRI), says an Israeli scientist.

Ilan Dinstein of the Weizmann Institute of Science is leading a study that is scanning the brains of sleeping toddlers from as young as 12 months to close to four years.

Dinstein was a guest speaker at an event organized by Weizmann Canada to raise awareness of research at the institute and how it is benefiting humanity.

IDF to use 'all defensive means' to protect borders

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Benny Gantz said Monday that Israel must remain on high alert, following the violent clashes that erupted a day earlier along the border with Syria.

"We must remain alert and prepared," said Gantz. "The IDF is prepared to use all the defensive means at its disposal to prevent terrorist attacks and large-scale attempts to breach the border."

Syria said on Monday that 23 people were killed in Sunday's "naksa day" rally, commemorating 44 years since the 1967 Six Day War. Israel captured Syria's Golan Heights in that conflict, as well as the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

An IDF investigation into the violent clashes on the border with Israel revealed on Monday that troops had been limited in their use of sniper fire, shooting only a few live bullets at the protesters trying to breach the border.

Senior IDF officials told Ha'aretz that the army's operation was carried out in a way to reduce the number of injuries among the protesters.

According to the IDF inquiry, a number of Syrian protesters had been killed when Molotov cocktails that the protesters had been throwing set off an anti-tank minefield, near the border town of Quneitra.

Palestinian and foreign peace activists at Qalandia, between Jerusalem and Ramallah, set an Israeli flag on fire during a naksa day protest marking the 44th anniversary of the Six Day War on June 5. [Flash90 Photo]

The IDF said that since all the casualties were on the Syrian side of the border it was unable to provide an exact count, but it expressed great skepticism about the Syrian figures. Soldiers fired "with precision" at the bottom half of the bodies of the protesters, the army said.

The army accused the Syrian government of creating a deliberate provocation in an effort to divert world attention from its ongoing bloody repression of pro-democracy protests at home.

In contrast to nakba day, when the IDF was caught unprepared, the IDF prepared for mass infiltration attempts along every possible border on Sunday. The IDF had also reinforced the border with extra barbed wire and deepened the ditch between the double fence.

Syrian police officers in the area simply stood aside and let the marchers pass. The protesters were accompanied by crews from Syria's government TV station.

The violent clashes prove that the Palestinians are not interested in a solution based on 1967 borders, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said on Sunday. Rather, they are interested in a solution based on 1948 borders he added.

The U.S. State Department responded to the violence by saying that Israel "like any other sovereign nation, has the right to defend itself."

French propose peace plan before UN showdown

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — French Foreign Minister Alain Juppe offered Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu a proposal last week aimed at breaking the Israeli-Palestinian deadlock before the expected showdown at the UN General Assembly in September.

In a first for the wider international community, the French initiative incorporates the position that the goal of negotiations is "two states for two peoples," not just "a two-state solution."

The French proposal would revive the talks based on the following principles.

The border issue would be discussed based on the 1967 borders with agreed land swaps, in keeping with U.S. President Barack Obama's speech.

Security arrangements for both sides – Israel and the Palestinian state – would be negotiated.

The negotiations would begin with a discussion on borders and security arrangements, while talks on the refugees and Jerusalem would be put off to a later date.

The document states explicitly that the negotiations' goal is "two states for two peoples," not just "a two-state solution," as the international community and Palestinians have put it. This approach is significantly closer to Netanyahu's demand that the Palestinians recognize Israel as "the nation state of the Jewish people."

Contrary to the international community's former position, the proposal does not stipulate that Jerusalem would be the capital of both states, but only that the Jerusalem issue would be solved via negotiations.

The French document was given to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas last week during his meeting with Juppe in Rome, where President Shimon Peres met with Abbas last Thursday.

Juppe made it clear to Netanyahu and Abbas that he wanted their comments on the proposal within the next few days.

Juppe said that if both sides responded favourably, France would be willing to convene a peace conference in Paris next month to resume the direct talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, a French diplomat said.

Both Netanyahu and Abbas said they would reply to the proposal within a few days. A senior Israeli official confirmed that Netanyahu had received the document and was examining it.

Netanyahu told Juppe that Israel is demanding that negotiations be based on an Israeli military presence on the Jordan River, the recognition of Israel as the Jewish state and acknowledgment that Palestinian refugees would not return to Israel, the official said.

Netanyahu also said the talks would not be resumed with a unity Fatah-Hamas government that did not recognize Israel and renounce terror. Juppe hinted to Netanyahu that the proposal was approved by the U.S. administration and other major European Union countries, the official said. He said the initiative was intended to present an alternative to the Palestinians' unilateral move to seek full UN membership in September.

If no progress is made in the peace process by September, France would consider recognizing a Palestinian state, he said.

The French initiative comes a week and a half after Netanyahu's speech in the U.S. Congress, which disappointed the American administration as well as key European Union members – France, Germany, Britain, Italy and Spain.

Senior European diplomats said Netanyahu's speech did not deliver the goods that could block the Palestinian move in September.

The five large EU states are trying to persuade the Americans to convene a meeting of the Quartet's foreign ministers to present principles to resume the peace negotiations, including the principle to conduct the talks based on the 1967 borders with land swaps.

The Quartet – the United States, United Nations, EU and Russia – will also call for a peace conference in Paris. The Europeans believe this could dissuade the Palestinians from asking the United Nations to recognize the Palestinian state and return to the negotiations.

Ha'aretz has learned, however, that the White House and U.S. State Department are also working on ideas to stop the Palestinian move in September, even if they don't persuade the sides to resume negotiations.

Ottawa prof ordered extradited for Paris shul bombing

Compiled by CJN Staff

Former Ottawa sociology professor Hassan Diab has been ordered extradited to France to face murder and attempted murder charges in connection with a deadly 1980 shul bombing in Paris that killed four people.

Ottawa Superior Court Justice Robert Maranger made the ruling Monday morning. It gives federal Justice Minister Rob Nicholson final say on transferring Diab to France.

But Diab's lawyer told reporters his client will appeal the decision. Diab had been living at home while on bail, but was immediately taken into custody after the ruling.

Diab, a Lebanese-born sociology professor who has taught at both Carleton University and the University of Ottawa, is alleged to have planted a bomb in a motorcycle saddlebag outside Paris' Rue Copernic synagogue in October 1980 that killed four passersby and wounded more than 40 others.

French police allege five men from the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine were responsible, and they fingered Diab as being in Paris at the time with false papers and living under an assumed name. They allege Diab made the bomb and planted it in the motorcycle.

He was arrested in November 2008 in Ottawa.

Handwriting analysis provided by France showed a high degree of probability that the Lebanese-born Diab signed a Paris hotel slip under a false identity, which was also used to purchased the motorcycle used in the bombing. Defence experts challenged the validity of the French handwriting evidence, which his lawyer said called into question whether Diab could be handed over to French authorities.

Diab, 57, has denied all charges against him, citing mistaken identity, and said the accusations were motivated by his Middle Eastern heritage. He maintains he was a student in Beirut at the time of the bombing.

The case could ultimately reach the Supreme Court, because it has set a number of precedents in its challenges to extradition law, the Ottawa Citizen reported.

"We are gratified that authorities in France and Canada pursued this case even 30 years after the murderous attack on the synagogue in Rue Copernic," Canadian Jewish Congress president Mark Freiman said after the ruling.

"This sends an important message – that diligent, committed authorities will never cease in their pursuit of justice against possible perpetrators of terrorism and in support of victims of terrorist acts."

A snapshot of new Jewish identity in central Europe

Ruth Ellen Gruber
JTA

BUDAPEST — A generation after the fall of communism, Jews in central Europe feel comfortable where they live but are concerned about antisemitism.

They like to visit Israel but don't want to move there. And they feel that they don't have to be religious to be a "good Jew."

These are some of the findings in Identity a la Carte, a landmark study of post-communist Jewish identity, affiliation and participation released last week.

"The most important feature for the post-communist generation is that Judaism is no longer experienced as a stigma that needs to be concealed," said Marcelo Dimentstein, operations director for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee's (JDC) International Center for Community Development, which commissioned the study.

"On the contrary," he said, "this is a generation that is proud of being Jewish and has positive feelings about it."

Carried out in 2008-09 by a team of leading demographers, Identity a la Carte is the most wide-ranging and in-depth comparative examination of Jewish life and attitudes in central Europe since the Iron Curtain came down more than 20 years ago – central Europe's version of the decennial U.S. National Jewish Population Survey. In fact, one of the demographers on the Identity a la Carte team, Barry Kosmin, directed the 1990 NJPS.

The European identity study focused on Jewish adults in five key countries that have witnessed a post-communist Jewish revival: Hungary, Poland, Latvia, Romania and Bulgaria.

The main objective, the report's authors said, was to help Jewish community leaders and organizations that work in central Europe, the JDC among them.

"It is very important that a Jewish organization wants to get real data and wants to face the reality in which it has to work," Hungarian sociologist Andras Kovacs, who coordinated the survey, told JTA. "It's important that Jewish organizations discover the importance of real data."

Luciana Friedman, president of the Jewish Community of Timisoara, Romania, said that "as applied research, it will inform and enrich our policy and programs."

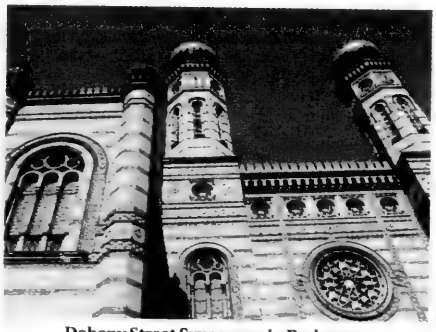
The research that went into Identity a la Carte concentrated on several key areas, including religious observance, Jewish identity, antisemitism, Israel, Jewish knowledge and organizational affiliation.

The survey sample was made up of 1,270 Jews aged 18 to 60 living in urban centres, where most of the Jewish population in each country resides. Face-to-face interviews were carried out based on a common questionnaire for all the countries. Identical criteria and terminology were used in all five countries, where Jewish populations range from 5,000 in Bulgaria to 100,000 in Hungary.

The survey's results are presented in a dense, 200-plus-page report full of charts and analysis that reveals both commonalities and sharp divergences from country to country.

Some results confirm assumptions, such as findings that Jews have higher levels of education and better standards of living compared to fellow non-Jewish citizens. Other results challenge preconceptions.

In all countries, respondents said that Jewish identity was more important to them today than it was in their childhood: 81 per cent in Poland, 73 per cent in Hungary, 66 per cent in Bulgaria, 63 per cent in Romania and 62 per cent in Latvia. About one-fifth of the total respondents said their Jewishness had been concealed from them in their childhood home. At least one-third of respondents in each country – and more than half in Poland and Romania – said they were more involved in Jewish life now than five years ago. Between one-quarter and one-third of respondents said they wish to be more active in the future.



Dohany Street Synagogue in Budapest.

"The strength of Jewish identity, when contrasted with the mixed backgrounds of participants, is something that's quite surprising," Dimentstein said.

In all five countries, however, religious observance was found to play a minor role in the formation of Jewish identity, with cultural, educational, social and other "non-religious communal activities" ranking higher.

"A majority of respondents in each country agree that someone can be a good Jew without participating in organized Jewish life," the report said.

Israel's role as an identity factor was deemed "significant" for more than half of the respondents in each country, except for Hungary.

But while respondents maintained close connections with Israel – 85 per cent have travelled to Israel and 66 per cent have visited several times – only 15 per cent to 22 per cent were considering making aliyah.

Respondents in all countries expressed concern about antisemitism. But at the same time, the report said, antisemitism "plays a relatively minor role in the formation of Jewish identity throughout the sampled countries."

Only in Hungary, the study said, did a majority of respondents foresee a significant increase of antisemitism in the future. Nearly half in Poland said they believed the level of antisemitism would fall.

In fact, respondents had generally optimistic views of the Jewish future in Europe.

Most respondents believed that European Jews "differ greatly" from Jews in Israel and America. Respondents who said they believe their Jewish community will continue to thrive in the next few decades consisted of 46 per cent from Romanian respondents, 55 per cent from Poland, 64 per cent from Latvia, 74 per cent from Bulgaria and 87 per cent from Hungary.

High numbers also agreed with the statement that Europe today "is a safe place for Jews to live" – 57 per cent in Latvia; 59 per cent in Poland; 61 per cent in Romania; 67 per cent in Bulgaria; and 77 per cent in Hungary.

Contrary to expectations, most of the survey respondents in each country were affiliated in some way with organized Jewish life.

"We had hoped to have a two-thirds majority of non-affiliated Jews in the sample, but this did not prove possible," Kovacs said.

"It was not a problem to contact non-affiliated Jews in Hungary and Latvia," he said. "But it was very difficult in Poland and Romania, if such Jews exist, as the network is broken. They have no links to the Jewish community."

Strategically speaking, Kovacs said, this means that future outreach programs there targeting non-affiliated Jews "could face extreme difficulties."

Israel Briefs

Shipping magnate dies

Sami Ofer, one of the two patriarchs running an Israeli shipping firm embroiled in an Iran scandal, died last week in Israel at age 89 after a long struggle with an undisclosed illness. Two companies owned by Ofer and his brother, Yuli, appeared last month on a U.S. list of entities to be sanctioned for dealings with Iran's energy sector. In one case, a company was alleged to have been involved in providing a tanker to Iran. Additionally, at least eight ships belonging to Ofer companies are alleged to have docked in Iran in recent years. Israel's attorney general is investigating the charges, which the Ofer brothers have vehemently denied.

Still no gas from Egypt

Egypt has not resumed supplying gas to Israel, despite a month ago repairing a pipeline that was attacked by terrorists. Egypt's oil minister said the need to secure the pipeline against future attacks, not politics, were preventing the resumption of supplying gas to Israel. U.S. investors in the East Mediterranean Gas Co., which owns the pipeline, have taken legal steps against the Egyptian government to make sure that gas flow resumes to Israel. Egypt supplies Israel with more than 40 per cent of its natural gas needs to produce electricity.

Border fence goes up

Construction has been completed on the first permanent section of a border fence between Israel and Egypt. The fence will be nearly 135 miles long when it is completed in mid-2012. A decision to speed up construction of the fence was made by the Ministry of Defence just days after Egypt opened its Rafah border crossing with Gaza in the Sinai.

Israel weighs Palestinian statehood options

Linda Gradstein
JTA

JERUSALEM — While U.S. officials are running a full-court diplomatic press against the Palestinian bid for UN recognition of statehood this September and officials at international Jewish organizations are trying to convince foreign leaders to oppose statehood, the Israeli government appears to be taking a different approach: acceptance.

Last week on Monday, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told a Knesset committee that there is no way to stop the UN General Assembly from recognizing Palestinian statehood.

"It would be possible to get a resolution that the world is flat" in the UN General Assembly, Netanyahu said in a jibe at the body, where anti-Israel resolutions have a virtual automatic majority. The Palestinians routinely have relied on the bloc of Arab and Muslims states and their allies in the non-aligned movement of mostly Third World countries to pass anti-Israel resolutions.

A senior Israeli official close to the prime minister said Israel is not particularly concerned about a vote for a Palestinian state in the General Assembly.

"We have very low expectations of the General Assembly," he said. "Every year they pass at least 20 anti-Israel resolutions, including one condemning Israel for attacking the Iraqi nuclear reactor in 1981."

Rather, the Netanyahu administration is relying on the fact that General Assembly resolutions do not have international legal standing and that in the UN Security Council, where resolutions do carry the force of law, the United States would veto any such resolution.

But Israel remains concerned, the official said, that the Palestinians will use a General Assembly resolution to harden their positions against any compromise with Israel.

For now, Israeli officials are focusing on trying to limit the diplomatic damage that a General Assembly resolution could cause.

"The president of the General Assembly said that even if a resolution passes, this isn't statehood," said a former Israeli ambassador to the United States, Zalman Shoval, who accompanied Netanyahu on his recent trip to Washington. "But there will be negative repercussions. Countries will certainly use it for anti-Israel propaganda. They may even try to take economic steps against Israel, like divestment."

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak has gone even further, warning of a "diplomatic tsunami" in September.

During the previous Israeli government, when Ehud Olmert was the prime minister and Livni the foreign minister, she held many meetings with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. According to recent statements by Olmert and Abbas, they made significant progress on the issue of the future of borders of a Palestinian state.

Most Israeli analysts say it is unlikely that peace talks will be renewed before September.

"I think Netanyahu knows that any political initiative for restarting peace talks is a non-starter and that the Palestinians have no intention of returning to negotiations," said Yossi Alpher, a former Mossad official and the editor of the joint Israeli-Palestinian website Bitterlemons.org. "His strategy is to hunker down and not to rock the boat."

Israeli officials say their strategy to achieve a peace agreement with the Palestinians is the same as it always has been.

"The only way to achieve peace is through Israeli-Palestinian negotiations," Israeli government spokesperson Mark Regev told JTA in an interview. "There can be no outside imposed solution that will work. Everything else is at best a mirage, and a one-sided vote at the UN could well set back the peace process decades."

There is growing concern in Israel that violence could return to the region after the Palestinian action at the United Nations in September, including a third intifadah, or uprising. There have been campaigns online calling for a third intifadah, including a page on Facebook that was removed by the social media company.

Former Shin Bet security chief Yuval Diskin, who retired this month, said he is "very worried" about what may happen after a unilateral Palestinian declaration and warned the situation could quickly deteriorate. A recent survey by the Israel Democracy Institute found that 70 per cent of the Jewish public in Israel expects a new wave of violence following September. A majority, 58 per cent, believed that the PA would encourage the violence.

Israeli a possible successor to Strauss-Kahn

Eytan Avriel
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Fitch, which ratified Israel's A/Stable credit rating a couple of weeks ago, did not have time to factor in the possibility that Israel would lose Stanley Fischer.

Actually, even if the credit rating agency had known that the respected Bank of Israel governor might be named the next chair of the International Monetary Fund (IMF), replacing Dominique Strauss-Kahn, it wouldn't have changed its rating. Credit rating agencies base their ratings on economic fundamentals and forecasts, not the identity of state officials. But in their heart of hearts, the Fitch analysts would have known that Fischer's departure would be a new entry on the list of Israel's economic risks.

Fischer remains a superb governor of the Bank of Israel, perhaps the best ever. The fact so many economic sources have crowned him the best candidate speaks for itself. His hand guided Israel to safe harbour through six years of economic upheaval.

The Israeli economy was growing before the great economic crisis and was damaged much less than any other Western country. Then as the crisis began to wind down, Israeli economic growth resumed. The labour market is buoyant and unemployment is low, a state of affairs the rest of the West can only envy.

But Fischer brought Israel much more than decision-making powers of an experienced, talented economist. Because he's an American, because his children don't work in Israel and because he came to the job with a reputation built up abroad, he became the first truly independent governor of the Bank of Israel.

He was independent of the politicians, the tycoons, academia and potential employers for himself and his children. That in and of itself made him extraordinary: He was free to shape the economic agenda as he saw fit, boldly going into areas no central banker had gone before.

That's how he got Bank Hapoalim Chair Danny Dankner dismissed for mismanagement of the bank, despite the belligerent resistance of tycoons and their pet media outlets. He also tipped the scales on the battle over the state's royalties from gas – Fischer, not the prime minister.

Stanley Fischer

Fischer has become, in effect, Israel's prime minister for economic affairs. He leads the battle against soaring housing prices. He warns the loudest over the state of education in Israel and the state of the poor. There is practically no area, other than foreign policy and defence, where he hasn't allowed himself to intervene. That's how it is when you're perceived as the only responsible adult in government, when you have a local and international reputation unmatched by any of your predecessors. And thus his personal reputation has come to reflect on Israel.

But who could replace him?

As far as is known, Fischer would very much like to lead the IMF. He is 67. It would be a glorious end to a brilliant career. When accepting a second term as governor of the Bank of Israel, he hinted he might not see it through, which had the pundits wondering if he hadn't cocked an eye at another job, like president of Israel when Shimon Peres retires.

Until the deal is closed, Fischer isn't saying that he even wants the IMF job. When asked about such things, he always answers that he doesn't comment on jobs he hasn't been offered.

Fischer served as the IMF's first deputy managing director from 1994 through 2001. He headed the economics department at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where he was U.S. Federal Reserve chair Ben Bernanke's thesis adviser. Factors that could damage his chances include his age – Fischer is 67 – and the fact an American already heads the World Bank. Fischer was born in Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia) and became an Israeli citizen in 2005 when he took the job as governor of the central bank.

If he's offered the job, Israelis will face a dilemma. On the one hand, one would like to thank him for his brilliant time in office and take pride in having an Israeli lead the IMF. But can a successor be found who would be independent and daring like him?

Given the paralysis of the political system and its dependence on big business (and party centres), Israel needs an independent governor for its central bank more than ever, a person whom the narrow interest groups can't touch. As the soccer fans in the stands howl when a favourite player gets an offer from a foreign team: "Stanley Fischer, stay, stay, stay."

Chip-maker to open R&D centre in Israel

JERUSALEM — Computer chip-making giant Advanced Micro Devices (AMD) is expected to announce the opening of a research and development centre in Ramat Gan.

The new centre will be located in the area of the Israel Diamond Exchange.

The R&D centre will build on the work of Israeli startup Graphic Remedy, acquired by AMD in October 2010 for $5 million (US). Graphic Remedy, founded in 2004 by Avi Shapira and Yaki Tebeka, specialized in simulation and debugging software for graphics applications and computer games.

AMD did not buy Graphic Remedy for the purpose of turning it into an R&D centre, said Ben Bar-Haim, general manager of AMD Canada: his company had been looking for good technology and found it at Graphic Remedy. When AMD bought it, the Israeli startup had just five employees. The Ramat Gan facility will be one of 15 AMD development centres around the world.

Bar-Haim said it was the talent and high quality of the employees it found in Israel that led AMD to decide to open the Israeli location. The company intends to expand the centre, but it's not clear how many employees will be hired, he said.

"It won't be an office with thousands of workers. We have not come to compete with Intel in terms of numbers," Bar-Haim said. Intel, the No. 1 chip maker in the world, is AMD's biggest rival in the manufacture of microprocessors and other chips. "The goal is to find the right people," he added.

When asked whether AMD was late in coming to Israel compared to other global high-tech giants, Bar-Haim said AMD is an international company and there are talented people all over the world. Nonetheless, you don't open a development centre everywhere, "but when you find the right formula you do it. And we found that formula here in Israel."

Reforming Canada's taxation of corporate groups
A step in the right direction

In late 2010, the Department of Finance launched consultations regarding a new system for the taxation of corporate groups that allows them to offset their members' profits and losses.

As active participants in this consultation process, KPMG is recommending that this new system also allow for the transfer of various tax attributes in addition to tax losses.

As the consultations are ongoing, contact your KPMG adviser if you have losses and other tax balances not being used. We may be able to help you unlock these benefits to build additional value in your business.

Documentary on newly observant pop musician

Kathryn Kates

The band Men with Babies auditioned four years ago for North By Northeast (NXNE), a local festival that combines music, film and interactive conferences.

The group, led by eccentric frontman Menachem Feuer, failed to make the cut, but in an ironic turn of events, a documentary about the group will screen at this year's NXNE.

Feuer is a newly observant Orthodox Jew, and in Shlemiel, a 25-minute documentary, filmmaker Chad Derrick tells his story. Derrick shot the documentary over a five-year period, following Feuer into Toronto's chassidic community, into nightclubs and back to his hometown in New York's Adirondacks.

Derrick knew Feuer's wife, Kinneret, through mutual friends. When the two bumped into each other at a Matisyahu concert, she suggested to the filmmaker that he do a documentary on her husband.

"Like Menachem and Kinneret, I took on more Jewish observance at around the same time they did, around young adulthood," says Derrick. "So, we had a shared sense of values and commitment to this lifestyle. So, I explored a lot of my own questions through what specifically Menachem was going through as well."

Derrick thought Feuer was a compelling frontman and, through the documentary process, realized how compelling a character Feuer was on film.

"I wasn't sure exactly what story we were going to end up telling," says Derrick. "I didn't go into shooting this film with a script. I went in with a sense of direction, but there were a lot of questions of what story was eventually going to be told. I was content to let the process of following him tell itself to a certain extent. I didn't know if the film was going to focus on the life of the band and if they were going to be successful or not, or if this was going to be a movie about fathers and sons because of his relationship with his dad, which was also fascinating. For me, it became a story about Menachem's spiritual journey."

Derrick would like to have it screened at Jewish film festivals and documentary festivals. He would also like the film to be screened throughout North America, to be part of discussions covering important subjects to him, including the challenges faced by newly observant people of faith, such as the Feuer family and his own.

"The film is about the navigation that takes place living in these worlds of religion, culture and art, while staying true to ourselves and the people we were before we became religious. Menachem never left behind the person he was before he became religious. It was always important to him, and that really motivates the choices he continues to make."

Derrick, who is married to graphic artist, Atarah, and is the father of two sons, Razi, 6, and Elisha, 3, spent 12 years working in the documentary film and television industry and has several short documentaries to his credit.

His film Mao Lounge was screened at the 1997 Toronto International Film Festival and around the world. In addition, Derrick worked at Vision TV and is currently an associate producer on CTV's W5, where he has helped produce more than 30 documentaries.

Shlemiel will be screened at NXNE 2011 on June 19 at 2 p.m. at the National Film Board of Canada's Toronto Mediatheque. For information, visit www.shlemiel.net. NXNE 2011 runs from June 13 to 19 with 650 bands, 50 stages and 60 films and 75 interactive conference sessions. For more information, visit www.nxne.com.

The search for the next Jewish star

Laura Fixman
Intern

Jews from around the world between the ages of 16 and 26 who think they have what it takes to become a famous singer can prove themselves by competing in the Hallelujah Global Jewish Singing Contest.

Those who have entered the contest so far, by uploading a video of themselves to YouTube singing any song in any language, are from various countries including France, Russia, England, Australia, the United States and Canada.

On June 15, 30 finalists will be chosen to go to Israel for a three-week tour, during which they will take singing lessons from top Israeli artists. The tour's final stop will be in Ramat Hasharon, where they will perform in a concert that will be broadcast on Israeli national television.

The contest's winner will record a single with a major Israeli artist to be played on the radio in Israel. He or she will also receive a scholarship, offers of career advancement and opportunities to perform for Jewish communities around the world.

Nicole Raviv is a 17-year-old Montrealer who entered the contest in hopes of advancing her singing aspirations. Raviv attends Dawson College where she's studying health sciences, but she said singing is her true passion.

"To be able to perform in front of thousands this summer in Israel along with the chance to possibly record with an Israeli artist is incredible," Raviv said.

She heard about the contest in the Israeli newspaper Yediot Achronot and immediately began practising for her audition video.

"I believe I have trained my whole life for something like this to come along," she said.

Raviv said although she'd like to win, being in the top 30 would be a great learning experience.

"If I don't win, I would gain experience with all the trained professionals I would work with and will experience what it's like to be in such a competition," she said.

Another Montreal teen who entered the contest is 17-year-old Moriel Shahin, who is also studying health sciences at Dawson College. She heard about the contest from the Facebook status of a friend who auditioned.

Shahin said that the contest encompasses so much that she loves. "I love Israel, and I love meeting people from around the world," she said.

Shahin chose to sing the Leonard Cohen song Hallelujah for her audition because of the name of the contest and because she said she sounded really good doing it.

"I feel like I put emotion into the song, and I feel like I have a connection to it," she said.

Shahin said that the opportunity to travel around Israel and learn from professional singers would be as good as winning the contest, and that she feels more impressed by her competitors than competitive with them.

"It's so cool that I'm looking at the video of someone from halfway around the world," she said. "Some of them are really talented."

Another contestant, 24-year old University of Calgary student Katia Jitlina, decided to enter the contest because she wanted to bring music to others, and also because the act of singing makes her happy.

"I think there must be some kind of endorphins that come out of it because it always puts me in a good mood," Jitlina said.

She said that she sees the contest as a learning experience, and she would like to learn from the Jewish vocalists from around the world that she would meet if she was chosen for the top 30.

"Taking every opportunity I can to make myself a better musician is very important to me, and that's how I look at this contest," Jitlina said.

These contestants can be supported by "liking" their videos on the Hallelujah Global Jewish Singing Contest Facebook page at www.facebook.com/Hallelujah.Star.

Dancer, jewelry designer turns to visual arts

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Toronto's Marla Buck said she is "making the world a more beautiful place, one person, one message, one paint stroke at a time."

The former dancer and jewelry designer began taking art classes two years ago and has already transformed her passion into a budding career.

After the Canadian artist Charles Pachter spotted Buck's work at an exhibit in April, he asked the painter to submit a piece for a large-scale charity auction.

Buck was thrilled to donate her art to The Autists, a fundraiser for the Geneva Centre for Autism, held on May 17 at the Royal Conservatory of Music in Toronto. Her painting, which she described as "a satirical knock of a few things," was one of the most hotly bid on items, fetching $3,000 for the cause.

"Very few pieces sold, so I was prepared for the worst, but it felt really good, most of all after finding out that it was purchased by people who embody what it is to be a light unto nations," Buck said.

Lola Rasminsky, founder and director of the Avenue Road Arts School, where Buck takes courses, said: "She now thinks of herself as a professional artist and is delighted with this turn of events."

Buck's work will be on display next at the school's annual Adult Art Exhibit at the Women's Art Association in Toronto on June 14 and 15. She said she would also like to do a show featuring her prayer boards.

"These are messages taken from Talmud and ethics classes I take with [ethics expert] Adrienne Gold and Rabbi Aaron Glazer and from various other words of Torah wisdom I've gathered from speakers and readings."

The phrases are written on wooden panels "because years ago I purchased some African art and one of the pieces was the Qur'an written on a bread board," she said. "Apparently, that's how to teach the Qur'an – bread and cheese five dollars extra."

Buck said she was recently at a funeral where the poem Everyone Has a Name, written by Holocaust survivor Zelda Schneersohn Mishkowsky, was read aloud.

"My show would be a series of life stages illustrating the poem. In every instalment vision, I would want each piece to sit like a tombstone, with the prayer boards in one straight line, on all four walls. This is how I get inspired. A seed in the air. You have to be open to catch it and let it take root."

Buck said art is her identity. Six months into starting classes at the Avenue Road Arts School, she broke her back and realized her calling. "I decided that once I recovered I had to pursue my creative destiny with abandon, because clearly that was what I was put on this earth to do, and I would find a way to make my mark and effect change."

Buck's creativity was first cultivated at age 17, when she went to Paris to study mime with Etienne Decroux, teacher of Marcel Marceau, Jean-Louis Barot, Jessica Lang and other actors. "It was a remarkable pedagogic study of corporal language, and began my understanding that every gesture can be poetry in motion," she said.

While in Paris, she auditioned "with no serious dance experience" and was chosen as one of 50 students to study dance with artist Caroline Carlson. After a workshop in the south of France, Buck went to New York and became a principal dancer in Alwin Nikolais' company.

Untitled

After three years of touring internationally, she decided that "age was catching up to [her] too quickly to remain in dance as a profession." Buck turned her attention to fashion and design, creating her first line of costume jewelry in 1982 for Calvin Klein's fall season.

"Armed with $17,000 cash, he gave me as a deposit, my jewelry career was launched, selling to every store that bought Calvin's collection."

Buck's costume jewelry and sterling silver watches were distributed in more than 800 of the best department and specialty stores in the United States, Canada, Japan and Europe. Her collections graced the runways of Guy Laroche, Bill Blass and Carolina Herrera.

Twelve years later, Buck "decided life was ticking by sans children and it was time to regroup," she said. She moved back to Toronto, had two children (her "best creations ever") and rediscovered her creative flair.

"Art is just who and what I am. It makes my heart beat faster, my mind stop working and my soul expand," she said. "The biggest travesty would be to not make it my full-time job, to not be grateful for the gift chosen for me. The only way I could possibly express my gratitude is to show my gratitude."

Jerusalem, the magnetic pole of western history

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Jerusalem was in the headlines once again recently when Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu reaffirmed that the ancient city will forever be the nation's undivided capital.

That Jerusalem should once again find herself in the middle of a political tempest should be no surprise. It certainly wouldn't be to James Carroll, a former Catholic priest and the writer of the book Jerusalem Jerusalem, How The Ancient City Ignited Our Modern World (Houghton Mifflin Harcourt).

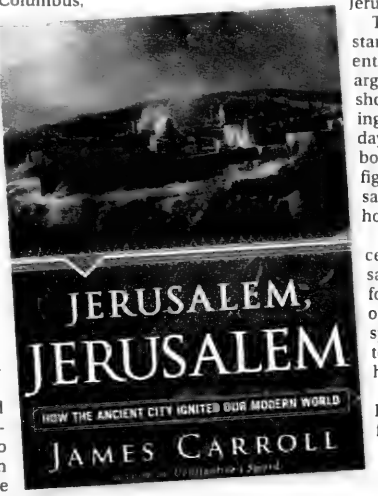
In it, Carroll, who in an earlier book, Constantine's Sword, tried to show how history-shaping events related to Christianity's turbulent relationship with Judaism, now attempts to show how Jerusalem has been at the fulcrum, directly or indirectly, of most major events from ancient times to 9/11.

He sets himself quite a monumental task and in essence this is more of a book about the history of western civilization than a book about Jerusalem.

He starts at the beginning, literally, with the Big Bang. He then argues that for early man, our hunter-gatherer ancestor, violence was a necessary part of life. However, this human predator had thoughts and feelings, and needed to find a way to cope with his violent behaviour.

Religion, he says, began as a way of resisting and controlling these violent impulses, but through the centuries and millennia that followed, religion instead became a reason for even more violence.

In just over 300 pages, with another 100 pages of annotation, Carroll, a scholar in residence at Suffolk University and a Boston Globe columnist, guides us through almost all major events of history: Judaism, Christianity, Islam, the Roman Empire, the Crusades, the Knights Templar, Christopher Columbus, the Pilgrims, Martin Luther, Spinoza, the Reformation, pogroms, the Civil War, slavery, Lincoln, the world wars, Hiroshima, Eichmann, the Cold War, Zionism, Israel, Cuba, the Yom Kippur War, Reagan, Chernobyl, al Qaeda and the Gulf Wars.



Jerusalem, Carroll claims, is lodged in the DNA of western civilization. "It became the magnetic pole of Western history."

Tying all these events to Jerusalem and showing how it did more to "create the modern world than any other city," works only to different degrees depending on the subject matter. Sometimes it seems forced.

Judaism, Christianity and Islam are obviously all connected to Jerusalem and related to each other through the patriarch Abraham. In fact, the significance of the Binding of Isaac on Mount Moriah is probably the strongest point Carroll makes.

When God sent an angel to prevent Abraham from sacrificing his son, this was God's way, Carroll says, of saying that humans were no longer required to perform human sacrifice, a well-established religious ritual of early man. Significantly, it was on this hilltop, many believe, that the early Hebrews settled and built Jerusalem.

The problem came when people started to interpret this story differently. Religious zealots started to argue that like Abraham we must show our love for God by being willing to sacrifice our children. To this day, as he shows in the rest of the book, sending our children out to fight wars and die in the "ultimate sacrifice" remains acceptable and honourable.

"What began in Genesis as a celebration of the end of child sacrifice was reversed, with the founding father glorified, not for obeying the divine command to spare his son, but for his readiness to plunge the knife into the boy's heart," he writes.

Moving forward to the Babylonian Exile, Israel's hope was for the restoration of the kingdom in the Messianic age.

In an apocalyptic battle between the forces of Good and the forces of Bad, no price was too high to pay. This "led to an unprecedented emphasis on martyrdom with the expectation that faithful death would be rewarded by physical resurrection."

During the war with the Romans, the Jewish resisters "embraced martyrdom to the point of mutual suicide... The ultimate in holiness," he writes, "is readiness – if not to slay a son, to see him slain."

The prophet Daniel's apocalyptic visions were enhanced by the Christian Bible, especially in The Book of Revelation. Apocalyptic fervour would soon give rise to "God-sanctioned Total War" where a destructive battle between good and bad "could be contemplated as somehow fulfilling a divine plan."

After the Holocaust, he argues, every Israeli struggle became an apocalyptic struggle for her existence. Israel's temptation was to "regard every adversary as Hitler brought back to life, both threatening annihilation and deserving to be killed."

. He cites as an example the 1973 Yom Kippur War showing how Golda Meir was ready to sacrifice the earth and risk World War III by threatening to launch nuclear bombs at Cairo and Damascus.

"That Jerusalem nearly triggered the doomsday catastrophe is a fact of such magnitude that it must eventually be reckoned with. This paradox – the ultimate in child sacrifice – defines the moral conundrum that lies at the heart of the tragedy of Israel," Carroll writes. "The fate of Jerusalem is the fate of the earth."

As a concise history of the western world, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, makes for fascinating reading. But in addition to his love for cute little one-liners, "The Bible is so full of violence because it came into being to resist violence," there is a tendency for Carroll to generalize and rely on unsubstantiated supposition.

For instance saying that the Jews were written into the Christian passion narrative as the bad guys as payback for their rejecting the Gospel writers 40 or so years later is an interesting theory. But we'll never know the motives of the Gospel writers for sure.

That said, when he's on point describing the dichotomy of Jerusalem between the actual city and the apocalyptic fantasy it has inspired for generations, then Jerusalem, Jerusalem makes for a thought-provoking and enjoyable read.

Late bloomer a big part of Rays' success

Harvey Rosen
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Living on the fringe is no festival, especially when you're a diminutive and aging 29-year-old athlete trying to fulfil a lifelong dream to play regularly in Major League Baseball.

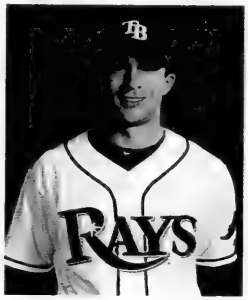
Diagnosed at age 10 with Type 1 diabetes and having to self-inject at least six times a day – often in the dugout between innings – could diminish your aspirations even more.

But Sam Fuld (pronounced Fold) has been a big part of the Tampa Bay Rays' early season success as they vie with the Yankees and Red Sox for first place in the American League's eastern division.

The lead-off hitter in the batting order, Fuld started the season in early April as if he was going to replicate his gaudy college numbers. During the first three weeks of the season, he was in the top 10 in batting and led the American League in steals. His outfield plays were so spectacular that they were featured on North American sportscasts almost nightly, and several near-impossible snags even made it to YouTube and MLB's website.

As of late May, opposition hurlers began to detect that Fuld struggles against lefties and have been pitching to his weaknesses. The result has been that his numbers have fallen off to a more realistic level, but in 44 games and 170 plate appearances, he hit 10 doubles, two triples and two homers along with 12 stolen bases and 18 runs driven in.

While stats are foremost in baseball, especially to players and fans, "Super Sam," as he has been dubbed, brings other intangibles to his game. Fuld already has two four-hit games to his credit in the early going, and as of late last week, he was hitting .234 with a slugging percentage of .354.



Sam Fuld

With the Durham, N.H.-born Fuld, the Rays now have their agitating lead-off hitter, and in late May, they went on a 20 of 27 winning streak after going 1 and 8 to start the season.

Fuld's getting the job done, and Rays' manager Joe Maddon considers him a real tough kid and a prize catch, especially after star left fielder Carl Crawford left the team after last season to sign with the Red Sox as a free agent.

But despite his current achievements, it's been a ponderously slow climb up the ladder to success. Fuld, who was for a second time drafted by the Chicago Cubs in 2004 in the 10th round, appeared to be a lifetime minor leaguer. He put in five seasons with the AAA Iowa Cubs, where he played in 230 games, had 811 at-bats and hit a respectable .273.

On occasion, he was called up to the Windy City, and between 2007 and 2010, played in 98 games. In only 131 at-bats, he hit .252 as a fourth outfielder and demonstrated that defence surely wasn't one of his shortcomings.

As luck would have it, the Cubs and Rays engineered an eight-player swap in early January, and Fuld was sent to Tampa Bay, where he made the team in spring training as the club's fourth outfielder. Maddon, a good judge of talent, recognized that the versatile Fuld could play all three outfield positions, is a speed merchant who's solid on defence, can steal bases and is a patient hitter who makes above-average contact at the plate. It wasn't long before he was put in left field and handed the lead-off spot in the batting order.

But Fuld is more than a diamond in the rough, as he starred at all levels. Being small of stature, he realized he was an underdog, because most major league teams prefer larger, stronger athletes in the outfield who can produce power at the plate and dish out instant victory with the long ball.

While programs list Fuld as five-foot-10 and 180 pounds, he admits that's a bit of a stretch and that five-foot-eight is more accurate.

A top player in high school at Berwick Academy in Southern Maine, he was recruited by 94 colleges. He selected Stanford University, where he majored in economics. He was a two-time All-American in his four years as a starter in centre field for the Cardinals. As a freshman, he batted .357.

At all levels, accolades, awards and titles foretold that the speedy, acrobatic, high-average hitter was destined to have a successful pro career.

For Fuld, however, baseball is only one of several reasons to be thankful. He comes from a supportive home where education was highly valued. His father, Ken, is a dean and professor of psychology at the University of New Hampshire, and his mother, Amanda Merrill, is a New Hampshire state senator.

Fuld is married to Sarah, his high school sweetheart, who is a top athlete in her own right, having won a pair of national lacrosse championships at Princeton University. They have a son together named Charles.

Israel to participate in World Baseball qualifier

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel has been selected by Major League Baseball to participate in the qualifying tournament for the 2013 World Baseball Classic.

The 16-team qualifying round will be held in the fall.

The Israel Association of Baseball will select the players. According to World Baseball Classic rules, non-Israeli citizens of Jewish heritage can play for Israel. The balance of the team is expected to be made up of top players on Israel's national team.

In addition to Israel, the other teams invited to the qualifying round are Brazil, Canada, Chinese Taipei (Taiwan), Colombia, the Czech Republic, France, Germany, Great Britain, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Panama, Philippines, South Africa, Spain and Thailand.

The international tournament, sanctioned by the International Baseball Federation, features the world's top players competing for their home countries and territories. Japan won the inaugural 2006 classic, as well as the second in 2009.

Loosen the reins, columnist says to overprotective parents

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Lenore Skenazy, who unwittingly spawned a new parenting movement called free-range kids following a column she wrote explaining why she let her nine-year-old son take the subway home alone, will be sharing her parenting ideas with reality TV viewers.

Still in the production stage, Skenazy, a New-York based syndicated columnist, author, blogger and public speaker will host a reality show called Free-Range Parents (working title), which will explore her view that parents need to dial back the paranoia and let their kids be kids.

Skenazy never dreamed that her 2008 New York Sun column titled "Why I Let My 9-Year-Old Take The Subway Alone," would arouse the kind of reaction it did.

"I had a column in the New York Daily News for six years... and I had a column for two years in the Sun, and it was only that one column that had the Today Show calling and everyone else," said Skenazy, who has since appeared as a guest on shows including Dr. Phil, The View, Good Morning America and Nightline.

In a followup column, Skenazy wrote in 2008 in response to the backlash, she said that the odds of a child being murdered by a stranger are miniscule, with crime rates lower today than they were in the 1980s and '90s, yet the culture of fear continues to gain momentum.

"Far more people die from falling off the bed or other furniture. So for safety's sake, should we all start sleeping on the floor? Well, upon reading that, I'm sure some people will. I'm also sure that pretty soon you'll see some 'expert' on TV talking about the hidden dangers of furniture. Behind her, a huge photo of a bed will be captioned: 'Worth the Risk?'" she wrote.

During her CJN interview, Skenazy said parents today are bombarded with warnings, about so-called dangers "whether it's the danger of going outside, or drinking from a plastic cup, or sleeping on their stomachs, or falling behind in kindergarten...

"It's a burden on us, and I don't think it's something that we parents sat down and decided, 'Let's be really paranoid and worried all the time because that will certainly enhance our lives and our children will appreciate it, too.' It's been foisted upon us," said Skenazy, the mother of two preteen boys.

"I want to raise my kids similar to the way my parents raised me, which was loving, caring, Jewish, and to a certain extent, worried. And yet, back then, worried did not include terrified at all times that any moment could be my last."

Since Skenazy coined the term "free-range kids" three years ago, she's turned the concept into the focus of her career, having published a book titled Free-Range Kids, How to Raise Safe, Self-Reliant Children (Without Going Nuts with Worry), giving lectures on the subject, running a blog, and now, hosting a parenting show that will air on the Slice channel.

She is currently travelling between Toronto and New York to tape 13 episodes of the show, which she hopes to finish by the fall.

Lenore Skenazy with her nine-year-old son Izzy.

"Each episode is about a different family that wants to sort of loosen the reins a little," she said.

"The show is not about daredevil activity, because I hate daredevil activity. I hate the idea that some day my child will be old enough to ride a motorcycle."

Rather she'll be overseeing families who have a problem with the idea of letting their children walk to school or cook a meal on their own.

Skenazy, who was in Toronto late last month filming an episode with a Toronto family, said they are currently casting more families in Ontario and the New York City area.

"What we're looking for are families that feel like they've been overprotective, but recognize that, and for one reason or another, they are open to change and open to loosening the reins a little bit."

Praised by some and dubbed "America's worst mom" by others, Skenazy said that her free-range kids concept is not about neglecting your kids.

"It's more about getting a grip on reality versus the horrors that are presented to us by everything from parenting magazines to the Nancy Grace show," Skenazy said.

Skenazy recalled the reaction she got when she blogged about a mom who left her child alone in the library's children's room for three minutes while she went upstairs to check out a book.

"There were 1,400 letters about this blog post. Most of them said, 'I wouldn't let my child stay there for three seconds without me, much less three minutes! Or, 'I don't care if the odds are one in two or one in two billion,' and it's like, really? You can't see the difference? Because if you can't see the difference between one in two and one in two billion, you shouldn't put on your shoe because there could be a deadly tarantula in there. The odds are slim, but they're there!" she said, laughing.

Skenazy said her idea of ideal parents are those who believe in their kids.

"When a parent says, 'Well, I do believe in you... I just don't believe you'd be safe if I left you in the park with your three friends for half an hour while I got a Starbucks.' That's the opposite of believing in our kids, even though we love our kids."

Skenazy said she also doesn't buy the argument that they trust their kids, but not everyone else.

"Well, guess what? Your kid has to interact with everyone else. And what you're saying is, you don't believe they can handle themselves in this situation or that."

She said that her philosophy is not "an all or nothing thing." People can choose to adopt whatever techniques and ideas they are comfortable with.

"It's not like I do all or nothing. I talk about how crazy it is that we're all so worried about our children falling behind, but I have a tutor for one of my kids. So at some point, you might say, this might be crazy, but I don't want him to repeat the seventh grade!"

Dear 16-Year-Old Me video goes viral

Laura Fixman
Intern

Have you ever wanted to reach into the past to warn yourself about all the mistakes you're about to make?

The David Cornfield Melanoma Fund in Toronto took that idea and used it to create a video warning viewers about the dangers of malignant melanoma.

The video starts with people warning their 16-year-old selves about typical teenage mistakes, including bad perms, bad movies and bad choices with alcohol.

The YouTube video Dear 16-Year-Old Me – which has been viewed more than 1.8 million times – features melanoma survivors and people who have lost loved ones to melanoma telling anyone who's 16, was once 16, or will soon be 16 what they wish they had known about the disease.

Sari Cornfield wishes she had seen the video when she was 16 because at that age she would lie in the sun and not know the dangers.

She created the organization behind the video, the David Cornfield Melanoma Fund, in memory of her late husband, David, a Jewish Torontonian who died of malignant melanoma in 2005 at the age of 32.

Cornfield said the video was created to raise awareness about melanoma, and it was more successful than she had ever imagined.

"We've had a lot of e-mails from people who said they've changed their behaviour after watching the video," she said.

The video quickly went viral, receiving well over a million hits, and Cornfield said it's because it's very relatable for young people. She said it's easier for them to understand the story of a young person who loved to be in the sun and then passed away from malignant melanoma.

"The stories are very real and these are not actors," Cornfield said.

The video states that melanoma is the most common cancer in young adults and that it's very treatable if caught early. Cornfield said that from reading the comments about the video, she realized that many young people have never even heard about melanoma.

"There are a lot of misconceptions that skin cancer is something you can just cut out," she said.

Cornfield's husband, David, was diagnosed with malignant melanoma when he was 29. After going through a year of chemotherapy, he was in remission for two years, during which he became a father and achieved career success.

When the cancer reappeared in his lungs and his brain, he spoke to his wife about his hopes that his story could be used to help others. Cornfield said the best part was reading the thousands of comments on the video.

David Cornfield, who died in 2005 from melanoma, with his wife Sari and son Noah in 2004, during his remission.

"People said they went to the dermatologist because of this video," she said. "I feel like that's a life saved."

The video featured several melanoma survivors and their families, and Cornfield said that it was a very emotional experience meeting them. One of those survivors is Aron Brager, a 29-year-old teacher at Robbins Hebrew Academy in Toronto.

He was diagnosed with melanoma when he was 19, when he decided he didn't like the way a mole on his leg looked.

Aron Brager

He said that what he is most proud of is the response he's getting from the parents of his students.

"Parents tell me they won't let their kids out of the house without sunscreen anymore," he said. "I feel like I'm a celebrity in my own community."

He said that this video was successful in part because of websites like Facebook and YouTube that make it very easy to pass information around. He added that it was an especially important video to watch as kids begin to go off to camp.

"It's stuff they didn't necessarily know about before," Brager said. "I take the comfort in the fact that people who didn't wear sunscreen might change their behaviour."

Before Brager was diagnosed, he said that he didn't know much about melanoma. At the time, he felt like he was the only person in the world with that diagnosis. Since then, he has run into people who said they had melanoma or that they know someone with melanoma.

"It's incredibly prevalent," Berger said. "It's way more common than I had ever imagined."

The video uses a mixture of humour and serious information to get its message across. Although it pokes fun at the fact that "ginger people have enough problems," including an increased risk of melanoma, it also offers serious warnings about the dangers of tanning and not wearing sunscreen.

Brager thought it was the best way to raise awareness among young people. He thought it would be effective, but had never expected so much success.

"I'm absolutely overwhelmed by it, and I'm humbled by it as well," he said.

The video recommends checking all of your skin once a month, for about 10 minutes, for moles that may have changed or look suspicious in any way. It was posted in May because that's melanoma awareness month.

Cornfield said that this video has achieved the goal of raising awareness.

Recycled paper

Recycle, reduce, reuse. Last month, my column discussed the challenge of recycling paper on which Jewish holy words are written. This month, we will focus on some key considerations to help you make sustainable choices about what paper you use, and how you use, and eventually reuse, that paper.

These three actions – choosing, using and reusing – help influence what paper options are available in the marketplace, as the actions of individuals, organizations and corporations can have a profound influence on the environment.

In business, as in life, decisions are made by weighing the costs and benefits of an action. When choosing what paper to use, whether to use it and how to dispose of it, individuals and organizations usually consider the cost of the paper in dollar terms, followed by the look and feel of the paper and how well a printer, copier or fax machine can use it.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

In addition to pure cost and availability, many individuals and companies now add an "environmental" component to their cost-benefit analysis. A good place to start when making an environmentally conscious choice in paper product is to look for a Forest Stewardship Council (FSC) logo on the product.

FSC is an international certification and labeling organization dedicated to promoting responsible management of the world's forests. It tracks fibres from certified forests to the consumer, through the FSC Chain of Custody system. When you purchase FSC-certified paper, you ensure that the value of conserving forests is considered, that the rights of aboriginal peoples and local communities are respected, that waterways are safeguarded and that natural wildlife habitats and species are protected.

Choosing what paper to use, however, should be more than a quick scan for an FSC logo: any decision should consider how and where the paper is made.

In addition, by placing paper into a blue box for recycling, you do several things. First, you divert waste away from landfills. This reduces the amount of waste that needs to be burned, buried or stored. Second, you reduce the need to create more paper. As less water and energy are required to create "new" paper from recycled parts – normally 100 per cent post-consumer waste – compared to creating paper from virgin fibre from newly harvested trees, you reduce the need to use non-renewable, or long-renewable resources.

Even though the recycled paper may be slightly more expensive because of higher manufacturing costs, many organizations are willing to pay more to avoid risking their reputation, especially if it allows them to align their actions with their personal or organizational beliefs. What type of message would you be sending to the community if you or your organization were fundraising to plant trees, but your communications were printed on non-FSC-certified paper with no recycled content?

Your decision on paper procurement may come down to budgetary considerations, but increasingly, forward thinkers are examining their environmental footprint. By understanding available paper options, considering the full life cycle of printing needs and reducing paper consumption you can be true to your personal or organizational beliefs, remain within your budget and reduce the environmental impact.

Jewishness: a death orientation?

Every day I receive an e-mail telling me who died in our community the day before. After reading it, I am convinced we, the Jewish people, have a death orientation. I considered why that might be.

In every generation the Jewish people have been persecuted. My friend, Moishe, who has ensconced himself in Jewish history, said recently how amazed he is that there has rarely been a peaceful time in the history of the Jewish People.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Death. I thought about the time I was in Israel during a terrorist attack, and the headlines in all the newspapers showed clear pictures of those who were murdered. It was as if the publishers, editors, journalists and newspaper boys had known the young girl on the bus, the senior, the Bedouin. I felt great respect for the Israelis, seeing their acute sensitivity for every man, woman and child, Jewish or Arab, but sadness at the heaviness they must harbour.

I then contemplated my own death orientation and how it plays out as a Jew. I was raised on death. My father was a rabbi so holidays were cut short if a community member died. We had to return home so my father could officiate. That's how it was. Death was part of our breakfast.

I thought about a camp a friend of a friend attended, where a night activity she participated in was predicated on Holocaust education. In it, she and her cabin mates were chased by (fictitious) Nazis. At the age of eight, this little girl was taught to be scared, and that Jews are hunted down and killed by psychotic maniacs. She was eight. Death.

The truth gets uglier. Not only does it seem we have a death orientation, but similarly we get an early education about the insanity of personkind. As an example, in the very first parshah, we read about the very first brothers – Cain and Abel – one of whom ultimately killed the other. Insanity. Why the first?

Shortly afterward the world is wiped out by a flood and only Noah and his family survive. Noah is then sodomized by his son immediately after descending the ark.

The last plague in Egypt, one which I had to skip at the seder I conducted for my son, is the killing of the Egyptian child. Where are we to hide?

Death, dying, murder, killing, rape – it's all around us. It's in the Torah, our history, our experiences and on our minds. We study about it, run from it in camp and die just a little bit every time we do.

And the affects of this death orientation has been dismal. Every morning we wake up to an e-mail telling us who died the day before, almost as if they were our own children. We drive by the most beautiful park in the city – Earl Bales – and our eyes do not drift to the magnificent jungle of trees but instead to the Holocaust memorial, where flames burn sometimes and names of children stare out at those skating by on roller day Sunday. Death. Insanity. It's right there.

Shavuot is here. It's a happy holiday, and we know that one of the Ten Commandments instructs us not to kill. But we know that the Torah we learn all night is rife with wars, battles and tragic death.

It's hard to know what to make of all this. Can one be a Jew and have a life orientation?

Lawsuit aimed at stopping Canadian boat in Gaza flotilla

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A 68-year-old Canadian-Israeli dual citizen is suing two Canadian organizations in an attempt to block them from sponsoring a ship in the second international Freedom Flotilla to Gaza.

Cherna Rosenberg filed her case against the Canadian Boat to Gaza and Alternatives International June 2 in the Ontario Superior Court of Justice in Toronto. She's charging the groups with raising funds for and providing material support to Hamas, which governs Gaza and was declared a terrorist group by Canada in 2002.

Under Canadian law, it's illegal to help or support "a designated terror group," Rosenberg's lawyers, Neal Sher of New York and Ed Morgan of Toronto, said in a statement last week.

Sher is the former executive director of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC).

Ed Morgan

Morgan, a University of Toronto law professor, told The CJN his case will also seek to make Canadian anti-terrorism laws more "robust and effective," in the same way as U.S. federal anti-terrorism laws have become more stringent.

He noted that recent legal developments in the United States "have indicated that if a person supplies a listed terrorist group with material and support, even if those materials and that support are of a humanitarian nature, that aid constitutes support of a terrorist organization and is contrary to the law."

Rosenberg, who divides her time between Israel and Canada, is seeking both an interim and a permanent injunction prohibiting the defendants "from continuing to raise funds, purchasing equipment or supplies, and purchasing or renting a vessel for the purpose of delivering goods or funds to the Gaza Strip."

According to a statement of claim – which outlines a plaintiff's cause for action – the suit also seeks to block the defendants "from sending goods, funds or any other material support, directly or indirectly, to Hamas or any of its representatives, and/or from aiding and abetting Hamas by assisting in bringing imports and exports to and from the Gaza Strip."

Diplomacy amid pomp and plumage

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was greeted in Rome Sunday by Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, who opposes a unilateral declaration of statehood by the Palestinians. Netanyahu was also slated to meet this week with German Foreign Minister Guido Westerwelle as part of a European trip that aimed to counter a UN General Assembly vote, expected in the fall, in support of a unilateral declaration by the Palestinians. [Flash90 photo]

Funding Lauded

TORONTO —Canadian Jewish Congress welcomed the permanent allocation of $1.6 million in annual funding to the Security Infrastructure Pilot Program through Public Safety Canada announced in last week's federal budget. "This vital program will continue to assist at-risk communities in protecting their communal institutions from violence and vandalism. As the Jewish community knows from direct experience, beyond the physical damage of such crimes, there is a deeper psychological damage to the victimized community. Such attacks leave it feeling isolated, vulnerable and unwelcome. We applaud the federal government for making this funding available," said CJC president Mark Freiman.

Mayor in Israel

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg Mayor Sam Katz was in Israel this week to attend the 27th International Mayors Conference. The gathering of 25 mayors from 18 countries, took place June 12 to 14 in Haifa, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. Katz's trip was sponsored by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University and the Israeli Consulate in Toronto. Katz was born in Israel, in 1951. His family came to Canada a short time later.

WORLD

PM Blames Jews

ISTANBUL — Turkish leaders, including Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, blamed Israel and its supporters for what they said was international media hostility to the country's ruling party. "This international media, as they are supported by Israel, would not be happy with the continuation of the AKP government," Erdogan said last week. "Of course, they have their hands on Turkey nowadays." Erdogan was responding to the Economist's endorsement of the opposition party ahead of this week's elections. Another minister, Egemen Bagis, described "international dark elites who control the international media."

Letter Detailed Hate

LOS ANGELES — A 1919 letter written by Adolf Hitler that is said to be the first time he outlined his idea to eradicate Germany's Jews will be exhibited publicly at the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles starting next month. It had been accessible only to historians. Hitler wrote the letter well before his rise to power in Germany, but he had already outlined the government's role in the extermination of the Jews.

Actor Tweets Against Circumcision

SYDNEY, Australia — Oscar-winning actor Russell Crowe railed against circumcision in a string of Twitter posts, denouncing it as "barbaric," before apologizing the next day.

Russell Crowe

The stream of tweets began June 9, in response to a query from an Australian follower. The tweets have since been deleted, but news outlets reported that the actor wrote, "Circumcision is barbaric and stupid. Who are you to correct nature? Is it real that God requires a donation of foreskin? Babies are perfect."

Crowe, who won an Oscar for his role in the 2000 film Gladiator, went on to address Jews directly. "Many Jewish friends, I love my Jewish friends, I love the apples and the honey and the funny little hats but stop cutting yr babies," (sic) he tweeted.

On June 10, after newspapers and news sites reported on his posts, he apologized over Twitter. "I have a deep and abiding love for all people of all nationalities, I'm very sorry that I have said things on here that have caused distress," he tweeted.

The flap began when Crowe responded to a follower on Twitter who asked if he should get his son circumcised. His comments came amidst a heated debate on a controversial San Francisco ballot initiative that would ban childhood circumcision if approved by the California city's voters in November.

Crimes against Jews up 'substantially' in 2009

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Seven in 10 religiously motivated hate crimes in Canada in 2009 were committed against Jews, Statistics Canada reported last week.

A total of 1,473 such incidents were reported in 2009, representing an increase of 437 incidents, or 42 per cent, over 2008, according to a report released June 7 on police-reported hate crimes.

More than half – 54 per cent – were motivated by race or ethnicity, while 29 per cent were motivated by religion and 13 per cent by sexual orientation, Statistics Canada said.

But the shocking numbers come when looking at crimes against the Jewish community.

In what Statistics Canada calls a "substantial" increase, in 2009 police reported 283 hate crimes against Jews, up 71 per cent from 2008.

Hate crimes against other faith groups were also up from 2008, though nowhere near the increase against Jews.

Crimes against Muslims increased from 26 incidents in 2008 to 36 in 2009, while police reported 33 hate crimes against Catholics, three more than in 2008.

Len Rudner, Ontario regional director for Canadian Jewish Congress, said the statistics were "depressing."

Len Rudner

"The Jewish community, traditionally, is the most targeted community for crimes motivated by bias on the basis of religion," he said.

Rudner added it was important to realize that many of these crimes go unpunished because of their clandestine nature.

For instance, a swastika spray-painted on a synagogue, or defacement of headstones in a Jewish cemetery, would be considered a hate crime, but the perpetrators of these acts are hard to track down, he said.

Statistics Canada noted in its report that "police-reported hate crimes refer to criminal incidents that, upon investigation by police, are determined to have been motivated by hate towards an identifiable group."

"All Canadians, not just Jews, should really be concerned" by the increase in hate crimes, Rudner said.

He also speculated that the uptick in hate crimes against the community in 2009 was linked to Operation Cast Lead, Israel's military action in Gaza to put an end to the shelling of southern Israeli towns by Hamas.

"We know that hate crime activity is affected by a number of elements, one of which is what is going on in the wider world" at any given time, he said.

Thinking about 2009, Rudner said, "whenever there is activity in the Middle East, more often than not we'll see that reflected in hate crimes against our community."

Rudner said he first started paying close attention to the correlation between Israel's actions and hate crimes against Jews in North America just after 9-11.

"In the months directly after 9-11, we saw a tremendous spike in [hate crime] activity against the Muslim community and also against the Jewish community," he said.

Everyday life in Israel's hospitals

More than moral blindness, it is moral inversion that grips the individuals of high conscience who advocate a boycott of Israeli exports and of Israel itself.

And they are no mere men and women of inconsequence who bellow for boycott. The latest group in Britain to do so is the University and College Union. This is the union's third kick at the boycott can since the union was created five years ago. Last year's effort was derailed by the application of certain irritating legalities.

But whatever their level of learning or station in life, the embrace of such fervent anti-Israel obsession has blinded the boycotters to the facts of daily Israeli life, many of which are inconvenient to them. Such facts can be found every minute of every day, for example, in Israel's hospitals.

The CJN visited two Israeli hospitals last month. Over the next few weeks, I shall use this space to convey some of those inconvenient facts that the boycotters wish us not to know.

About halfway along Israel's narrow nine-mile waist between the Mediterranean on the west and Kalkilya in the West Bank on the east, is the town of Kfar Saba. It lies near the mid-point of the densely populated coastal plain of the Jewish state between Ashkelon in the south and Haifa in the north.

From the editor's desk...

The Meir Medical Center is in Kfar Saba. It was opened 55 years ago next month as a treatment centre for tuberculosis sufferers. But with the early effective eradication of the disease, the centre became a general hospital.

The hospital has just over 700 beds. Some 2,300 people work there. Of these, 350 are physicians and 1,000 are nurses. Together they serve around 800,000 people, more than 10 per cent of all the people who live in Israel. The hospital's catchment area is the busy Ramat Hasharon, Netanya, Tulkarm, Kalkilya quadrangle and beyond, including patients from the nearby West Bank villages.

Dr. Asher Elhayany, the effusive director of the hospital told The CJN that from the very first moment he started at the hospital and became its director, four years ago, he was "impressed by the ambience at the hospital.

"It has quality and soul. It provides services that are the equal of the highest level hospitals and it has the soul of a small family," he elaborated. "Everyone cares for each other."

Elhayany spoke quickly, expansively, trying to impart as much information as possible in our few moments together. He spoke with obvious pride for the hospital and especially for the many people who work there.

Asher Elhayany

"It is very pleasant to work here," he said with a smile, while thinking, perhaps, of the small family atmosphere that he had told me permeates.

Then he proceeded to tell me about some of the special multi-disciplinary research and clinical programs at the hospital such as its intensive care and trauma practice, spinal and respiratory surgery, health promotion program, cardiovascular rehabilitation and sports fitness program, neo-natal intensive care program, and the children's care and oncology units.

A walk through the wards of any hospital almost anywhere on earth would yield the same emotional responses that the tour through Meir evoked in me. We see human beings at the edge of the ultimate issues of their lives, where so many of the people we greet, to whom we nod "hello" or whom we ask "how are you?" answer with tears in the corner of their eyes.

But what is noticeably different about the emotions that rise within us on a tour of an Israeli hospital is the surrealism, the incongruity, the unfairness of being with doctors, nurses, administrators, maintenance crews and patients who, despite all their labours, in the far-away world of the boycotters are vilified simply for being Israelis.

In addition, about 20 per cent of the staff of the hospital and of the patients treated at the hospital are Arabs, with some of the patients coming from the West Bank. At Meir, coexistence is not an elevating, lofty slogan. It is an every-minute-of-every-day, seven-day-a-week, life-saving way of life. The Arab patients whom I met and with whom I exchanged pleasantries would be hard-pressed to understand, let alone to support, the self-righteous boycotters.

The Canadian Friends of the Meir Medical Center are conferring the hospital's prestigious Medal of Merit this year on June 29 at the Westin Prince Hotel in Toronto upon former longtime Toronto MP Joe Volpe, Dr. Allan Gross, and Dana and Jared Florence, co-founders of Three To Be, a not-for-profit foundation that supports the treatment and therapy of children's neurological disorders.

STOPPING BY THE MARKET TO STRETCH

Infantry soldiers from the Golani Brigade did some serious stretching exercises at the Mahane Yehuda Market in Jerusalem on Monday morning. They were participating in the 25th Golani Brigade Race, which started at Israel's most northerly point, Mount Hermon in the Golan Heights, and ends at the most southerly point in Eilat. During the race, the soldiers stopped along the way to engage with Israeli citizens.

York Centre MP adapting to new life in Ottawa

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Mark Adler, the recently elected Conservative MP for York Centre said he still finds it all a little surreal.

Adler, 49, a self-described "public policy wonk" who unseated Liberal incumbent Ken Dryden in last month's federal election, said growing up in Bathurst Manor and now representing the neighbourhood and riding in Parliament is "a privilege."

The son of a Holocaust survivor – his father lived through the Lodz Ghetto and Auschwitz before immigrating to Toronto in 1947 and marrying – the soft-spoken Adler said he is both proud and humbled to be one of three Jewish MPs in the new Parliament.

Fellow rookie Conservative MP Joe Oliver (Eglinton-Lawrence) and Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler (Mount Royal) are the others.

"It's important for the Jewish community to have representation in the House [of Commons]," Adler said. "I think having someone who's Jewish in the caucus will help promote issues of concern to the prime minister, issues that may not have otherwise been brought forward."

Mark Adler

For example, he'd like to set up a Russian Jewish war veterans' museum in the riding.

"I'm working with them now to get this done," he said, noting that an "issue like this normally wouldn't make itself known to Parliament" if the riding's MP was not Jewish and cognizant of these issues in the community.

Adler is also the founder and CEO of the Economic Club of Canada (ECC), an organization that hosts speaking engagements "with the most important, relevant and influential leaders of our time," its website says.

Asked why he decided to jump into politics, Adler said he has always been interested in public service and has always been involved in community life.

He's also been a big fan of Prime Minister Stephen Harper for some time, especially because of the government's stance on Israel, the Jewish community and the economy.

"Harper had the right message at the right time for the Jewish community and for Canada," he said.

"I just felt that now was the time" to try political life.

Adler met Harper in 2007 at an ECC event, although he stressed that his company is "never a partisan forum for anyone" and that he never tipped his hand as to his political leanings while serving as its CEO.

Adler said now that he's a Conservative MP, he's in talks with "officials" in Ottawa to discern whether he can continue in his role as CEO and whether this would be a conflict of interest with his new job as an MP.

For the moment, though, he said he's "not actively involved" with the club.

But he said his work with the ECC helped prepare him for political life, because it gave him "a good vantage point" to observe first-hand how politicians and dignitaries conduct themselves, which "fed his interest" in politics.

As for his pledge to York Centre residents to work on their behalf, Adler said there are many issues in the riding that need to be addressed, and he believes some can be easily remedied.

'It's important for the Jewish community to have representation in the House [of Commons]'

Two of his major areas of concern are making Downsview Park more profitable and expanding the Sheppard subway line.

On the former, Adler said the park has a new board and there are plans in the works for "more development" there.

"But first we want to create the right balance between development and environmental considerations," he said.

As for the subway, Adler said he will continue to work on the issue.

He said he now has an expectation of himself that he must deliver on promises he made during the campaign.

"[York Centre residents] have placed their confidence in me, and I need to maintain that... shame on me if I don't help them and address their concerns and improve their quality of life. That's what the local member of Parliament can and should do."

Spiegel says goodbye Zareinu, hello Beth Tzedec

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Randy Spiegel says it was tough for him to think about leaving Zareinu Educational Centre, where he served for eight years as executive director, and that he remains passionate about the work he did at the school for special needs children.

But becoming executive director of Beth Tzedec Congregation in March of this year struck him as a unique opportunity.

"It's like being the town manager," he said in an interview in his new office at Canada's largest Conservative congregation.

As well, he sees his job as "a way of making a substantial contribution to the enhancement of Jewish life."

As executive director, Spiegel oversees staff and functioning of the synagogue, which has almost 2,700 member families.

He said that a big part of his job would be to "delve deeply" into the shul's budget – a number he declined to divulge – and to ensure financial stability and accountability. Last December, Beth Tzedec opted out of the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues – itself a breakaway group from the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism – citing financial reasons.

"In this day and age, I don't think any organization should ever think that it's financially stable," said Spiegel, who has implemented and managed major fundraising campaigns for Zareinu and Associated Hebrew Schools, where he was director of development and public relations from 1994 to 2002. "The financial and economic challenges that exist in our country and around the world are here at Beth Tzedec, too."

As well, Spiegel's duties include contributing to and implementing the synagogue's new "strategic vision," which is still being defined. He has come up with a personal motto – "Embracing our people" – that has appeared a few times in synagogue publications.

Randy Spiegel

Spiegel believes that "every place wants to have some kind of logo or motto that helps to succinctly define what I call the three big questions – who you are, what you're doing and where you're going – and that is the heart of strategic planning.

"What the leadership [of Beth Tzedec] are aspiring to do is embrace our people wherever they are and be able to engage them in Jewish life... for people to feel welcome here, for them to connect spiritually, educationally, socially and culturally."

When Spiegel was growing up in Hespeler, Ont. – now part of Cambridge – he "dreamed of having the type of opportunities for Jewish kids that existed in Toronto."

As a teenager in a town where there were no other Jewish families, Spiegel was involved in the Conservative movement's United Synagogue Youth through the Jewish community in Kitchener. He was also a camper and later a staff member at Camp Ramah, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement.

Both experiences contributed to his becoming more observant and led to his pursuit of higher Jewish education – a BA in Jewish studies from the University of Judaism and a double master's degree from Brandeis University in Jewish communal service and management of human services.

A member of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, which is Orthodox, Spiegel says that "putting a denominational flag into the ground" wasn't relevant to him growing up in a traditional Jewish home. "Being Jewish was what was relevant."

Now, too, he prefers not to focus on denominational labels. "I want to be doing things that bring us together."

Between their professional and personal lives, his family spans denominational worlds. Spiegel's wife, Debbie, is director of education at Holy Blossom Temple.

Spiegel said the board of Shaarei Shomayim's brotherhood has reached out to the Men's Club at Beth Tzedec to do joint programming.

Although he sits on the brotherhood committee, the outreach was not his initiative, he noted. "I hope I'm able to do lots of that type of facilitation."

Sefer Torah brings families together

Laura Fixman
Intern

There are precious few ways for families to take part in something Jewish all together, but a project to write a community sefer Torah at Adath Israel Congregation offered just such an opportunity, said the shul's executive director, Bernie Rabinovitch.

Some 700 families had a letter inscribed in the new sefer Torah, dedicated June 5, allowing them to fulfil the 613th of the 613 mitzvot, which requires each Jewish person to write a Torah during their lifetime.

"It gave them a connection to their roots," Rabinovitch told The CJN. "The families themselves will have actual ownership of a Torah."

It was a very emotional experience for the families, many of which included three or four generations, he added.

"It's amazing to see the expressions on the families' faces," Rabinovitch said as he waited for the dedication ceremony to begin. "It's a very profound experience for them."

The idea to create the community sefer Torah came from Adath Israel's board of directors, who wanted to find a way to bring congregants together and to raise money for much-needed renovations to the shul's sanctuary and parking lot.

Shul members contributed more than $800,000 to the project.

Speaking to The CJN ahead of the event, Rabinovitch said that it's appealing to congregants to be able to read from a Torah they have ownership in.

"In today's world, families are pulled in so many different directions," he said. "With this, they actually participated together in the most important aspect of our religion."

Members will be able to read from "their" Torah at bar and bat mitzvahs and other life-cycle events. Rabinovitch said it will give families, and especially children, a connection to the Torah.

He said the project encouraged members to feel more involved in the shul. He said that generally when families come to the shul for services or events, they're among hundreds of people, and parents and children often take part in separate programming, but this was something they could do together.

The dedication ceremony began with large donors, past presidents and family of clergy gathering to watch Rabbi Mordechi Tzvi Karro, a Miami-based sofer, inscribe the last word in the sefer Torah.

As Rabbi Karro waited for the ink to dry, he spoke about the importance of the process.

He said that it took more than 16 months to complete the project, but that by having one letter inscribed for them in the Torah, it was as if each person owned the entire scroll.

"It does not belong to one individual," Rabbi Karro said. "It belongs to all of us."

The ceremony continued with the Torah being brought into the sanctuary under a chupah so that it could be read from for the first time, which consecrated it and dedicated it to the synagogue.

Project committee chair Judy Schwalm spoke about the process of creating the sefer Torah, which involved educational programs for people of all ages and a souvenir for each participating child of their Hebrew name written on a piece of parchment.

Schwalm said Rabbi Karro answered all questions throughout the process, which helped make it a success.

"Our goals were to re-energize our community," Schwalm said.

Adath Israel's rabbi emeritus, Rabbi Erwin Schild, explained why this sefer Torah is different than all the others he's seen in his 63 years with the congregation.

Rabbi Mordechi Karro writing the last letter in Adath Israel's new sefer Torah. [Laura Fixman photo]

The others were bought or commissioned and delivered ready-made. Congregants never got to see the process, but in this case, they got to see the journey from blank parchment to a fully finished Torah.

The dedication ceremony ended with a parade of the Torah around the shul building.

Hate crime report

Whether it's the 2010 Gaza flotilla incident, 9-11 or Israel Defence Forces activities against Hamas and Hezbollah, any or all of them bring Israel, and by extension the Jewish community, "to the attention of people already negatively predisposed toward Jews and gives them a warrant to act out their hatred in a criminal fashion."

Federal Citizenship Minister Jason Kenney said he was "deeply concerned" by the report.

"Although part of this increase is due to greater awareness and more vigilant reporting, nevertheless, any incident of hate-based crime is completely contrary to the Canadian values of tolerance and respect for diversity," Kenney said in a statement.

He noted that Ottawa has made its Security Infrastructure Pilot Program permanent, earmarking $1.6 million annually for security enhancements "for sites at risk of being targeted in communities victimized by hate-motivated crime."

Freedom weeps

It was a sombre and searing anniversary that freedom-loving Iranians tried to commemorate on the weekend. Two years ago, on June 12, the presidential elections were stolen from the people of Iran by the country's thuggish, theocratic rulers. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was proclaimed the winner even though it was clear to objective observers that he was not.

In the aftermath of that monstrous electoral fraud two years ago, Iranians took to the street to protest against the regime's deliberate disregard for, and destruction of, the democratic process. Scores of demonstrators were killed by Iranian security officials and hundreds more arrested.

This past Sunday, Iranian security forces were reported to have shot at Iranians who again took to the streets to mark the second anniversary of the stolen election.

According to Ha'aretz, Iranian opposition websites Sahamnews and Kaleme both reported that the police were deployed to prevent anti-government protests. Sahamnews reported that police attacked protesters with electric batons. Kaleme reported that hundreds of demonstrators had been arrested. (As of this writing, neither report could be confirmed.)

While the Iranian regime was trampling the democratic rights of its people on Sunday, one of its key client states, Syria, followed in similar sordid suit against its own people as well.

Various media outlets reported that Syrian soldiers on Sunday rampaged in the northern town of Jisr al-Shughour. Stories of atrocities committed by the Syrian soldiers are widespread. Thousands of Syrians in the area have fled to neighbouring Turkey. As reported in Ha'aretz, a senior Turkish diplomat said 4,300 Syrian refugees had crossed the border, but a western diplomat said the number was higher. Witnesses said more than 10,000 were sheltering near the border.

There are no accurate independent accounts of what is actually happening on the ground in either country. Reporters must rely on the courage of the protesters and on fleeing refugees themselves for the news. This is due entirely to the fact that independent, accurate reporting does not exist in Iran or in Syria. Indeed, most reporting by western media of what is happening in Syria emanates from Israel, where reporters do not fear for their lives or for the right to write the truth.

Iran and Syria operate under a system of officially sanctioned sadism and brutality whose sole governmental objective is securing the permanence of their respective regimes. The well-being of their respective populations ranks far down their list of priorities. The establishment of people-oriented priorities in Iran and Syria suffers from, or more accurately, is guided by severe anti-democratic and anti-humanitarian ideologies.

Where are the NGOs to point this out?

25 years ago in The CJN

Violence by anti-religious extremists against haredi zealots who had been burning and defacing bus stops with racy ads erupted in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and other cities over Shavuot as the government tried to mediate between secular and observant Jews. There were no injuries, but there were many arrests and significant property damage.

Mideast war almost inevitable

The recent reconciliation between Fatah and Hamas has ominous and dangerous consequences. Hamas is still committed to the destruction of Israel, and it is inconceivable that any Israeli government would continue negotiating a peace treaty without a renunciation of violence and the destruction of the State of Israel. Fatah has always had Saudi Arabia as a backer, and Hamas, in turn, has been armed and supported by Iran. It is difficult to see Saudi Arabia and Iran as bitter enemies coming to the aid of both Fatah and Hamas. If indeed Hamas comes out as the victor in Palestinian elections, then Israel is faced with a new dilemma, in addition to the ones already affecting its survival.

Forces in Egypt have indicated that they will work to renounce Egypt's peace treaty with Israel. Hezbollah is now a part of the Lebanese government, and Syria, without any intervention by the United Nations, continues to be led by its murderous president. It is, therefore, incumbent on Israel not to surrender one inch of territory so that it remains behind defensive borders. To ask Hamas to amend its position and accept the existence of a Jewish state is only wishful thinking. Even the PLO charter has never withdrawn the clause calling for the destruction of Israel. These developments make a new Middle East war almost inevitable.

Endorse a Palestinian state

Clearly, Israel does not have any intention of negotiating a peace treaty for a two-state solution with its Palestinian neighbours. Its refusal to look at the 1967 borders as a foundation for a peace accord is really just icing on the cake of a long history of uncompromising and unilateral actions with respect to the creation of a Palestinian state. It continues to build settlements, continues to impose harsh measures on Palestinians, and continues in its quest to colonize large segments of the West Bank for its own advantage. As a Jewish Israeli-Canadian who loves Israel dearly, I call upon the nations of the world, including Canada, to recognize a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, once and for all signalling to Israel that its illegal and brutal occupation is bankrupt on the international stage.

Jews who were PoWs in Japan

I am the archivist of the AJEX Jewish Military Museum in London (Association of Jewish Ex-servicemen and Women of the United Kingdom) and am researching a book on Jewish PoWs of the Japanese. I am looking for transcripts of any audio or video material surviving in the families of PoWs or any stories written about this subject. Also, I am looking for photos of the men or women concerned. I am anxious to include chapters about Canadian Jews, or Jews who went later to live in Canada, in the book. Anyone who has or had a Jewish relative who was a PoW in World War II, please contact me.

Looking for Adele Gelbard

I am looking for Adele Gelbard, who was married to Hy Gelard. Hy was a cousin of my father, Rubin Joskowitz, from Poland. We met in Canada many years ago. They had three children, two sons and one daughter. My mother, Louise (Lusia), has lost touch with them. We are the "cousins from Texas."

Shul anniversary

Beth Lida Forest Hill Congregation in Toronto celebrates its centennial anniversary in 2012. The shul was originally established on Augusta Avenue in downtown Toronto in the early 20th century and moved to its current location on Gilgorm Road in early 1950. We are preparing a historical publication of Beth Lida and wish to hear from individuals with a connection to our congregation over the years. Former shul officers, members' children/grandchildren, people who had bar mitzvahs or weddings there and those who have stories or items of interest are encouraged to contact us as soon as possible.

Border invasion calculated to destroy Israel

Amiel Ungar
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

There is nothing innocent about the mass assaults we have recently witnessed on Israel's 1967 frontiers. Even if the mobs who attacked the border fences, and the Israel Defence Forces soldiers guarding them, with stones and Molotov cocktails had instead been genuinely non-violent, and had advanced on the border attired in black tie and to the civilized strains of a Vivaldi concerto – it would make no difference. This invasion is war is calculated to destroy the State of Israel and must be resisted.

We are dealing with people who have no intention of conquering the country that they seek to infiltrate; they merely want to establish residence there. No country can tolerate an attempt to trample its borders. If instead of infiltrating the United States by tortuous trails, millions of Mexicans were to demonstratively cross the Rio Grande River into El Paso, Texas, they would also be stopped forcibly.

This applies also to countries with borders plagued by territorial disputes or irredentist demands. Would Romania countenance thousands of "demonstrators" from Hungary attempting to re-Magyarize Transylvania? How would the Czech Republic and Poland be expected to handle a sudden surge of Germans seeking to "return home" to the Sudetenland and East Prussia? Even though in Europe there are currently no physical borders to dismantle (although the illegal immigration from the Third World may bring about their reimposition), the reception that the intruders would encounter would not be hospitable or gentle. Israel should therefore rebuff such infiltration attempts firmly and professionally, while attempting to minimize loss of life. However, if push comes to shove, we should employ all the means at our disposal with no pangs of conscience. It is a matter of survival.

In a sense we should ironically be grateful to the "demonstrators." The Palestinians in Syria, some of whom were conspicuously housed in dwellings that previously belonged to Syrian Jews, are not seeking to "return" to Gamla and Nob, liberated from Syria in 1967, or to "reassert their ownership" over Golan wineries: they want to get to a Jaffa that they have never seen. The same applies to their counterparts in Palestinian-ruled Gaza who march on the Erez crossing. Their aim is Ashkelon.

In Qalandiyah, between Ramallah and Jerusalem, the rioters took up Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's battle cry, from the second intifadah, that "a million shahids are on their way to Jerusalem." When prime minister Ehud Barak foolishly put Judea, Samaria and half of Jerusalem on the chopping block at Camp David in return for what was supposed to be closure of the conflict, Arafat and his million wannabe martyrs rejected the deal. For them, it is more important to destroy Israel than to establish Palestine.

The events of May 15 and June 5 reinforce another truth: U.S. President Barack Obama's address last month at the State Department – in which he prioritized the setting of borders above resolution of the issues posed by the population exchange between Jews and Arabs – should be rejected.

The footage from the Golan last week was not pleasant, but Israel would have been in far worse shape if the Nakba and Naksa demonstrations had been launched from areas adjacent to Israeli population centres rather than from the periphery. Imagine the demonstrators sallying forth from Qalqilyah, abutting Kfar Sava, from the environs of Jerusalem or from the "safe passage road" bisecting Israel and connecting Gaza to the eastern part of a Palestinian state. That would make for even more dramatic footage.

Consider also a situation in which on the establishment of a Palestinian state, Syria and Lebanon, which have vigorously rejected for more than half a century any attempt to induce them to grant citizenship to a million Palestinians, promptly deported them to the new state. The nascent Palestinian state would be unable to absorb them, and their anger and frustration would only have the rump state of Israel as an outlet.

Palestinians from Syria last month approached the border near Majdal Shams in the Golan Heights as an Israeli soldier watched. [Israel Sun photo]

The last thing we need to do is to broadcast defeatism and desperation. Former defence minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer told a radio interviewer recently that Israel has no response to the border protests and an attempt to explain its actions is doomed. In Ben-Elizer's mind, we must therefore beseech PA President Mahmoud Abbas to return to the negotiating table without prior conditions.

Why should Abbas return to the negotiating table to save an Israel that has no response? It would make more sense to ramp up the tactics that confound Israel. If Israel has no preconditions, you can bet that Abbas will have plenty of preconditions, and first and foremost, the ability to continue with these tactics from far more advantageous borders.

Reclaiming a historical truth

Efraim Karsh
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

I agree with Shlomo Avineri who recently wrote that the tragedy befalling the Palestinian Arabs in 1948 was exclusively of their own making, and that there is therefore "a grave moral defect in the Nakba discourse."

There is an overwhelming and incontrovertible body of contemporary evidence – intelligence briefs, captured Arab documents, press reports, personal testimonies, memoirs, and so forth – that while most Palestinian Arabs needed little encouragement to take to the road, large numbers were driven from their homes by their own leaders and/or the "Arab Liberation Army" (ALA) that had entered Palestine prior to the end of the Mandate. This was done either out of military considerations or in order to prevent them from becoming citizens of the prospective Jewish state.

In the largest and best-known example of Arab-instigated exodus, tens of thousands of Arabs were ordered or bullied into leaving the city of Haifa (on April 21 and 22) on the instructions of the Arab Higher Committee (AHC), the effective "government" of the Palestinian Arabs.

Only days earlier, Tiberias' 6,000-strong Arab community had been similarly forced out by its own leaders, against local Jewish wishes (a fortnight after the exodus, Sir Alan Cunningham, the last British high commissioner of Palestine, reported that the Tiberias Jews "would welcome [the] Arabs back").

In Jaffa, Palestine's largest Arab city, the municipality organized the transfer of thousands of residents by land and sea; in Jerusalem, the AHC ordered the transfer of women and children, and local gang leaders pushed out residents of several neighbourhoods, while in Beisan, the women and children were ordered out as Transjordan's Arab Legion dug in.

In Haifa, despite the strenuous Jewish efforts to persuade the Arabs to stay, the AHC ordered them to leave. This order was passed on to the local leadership by phone and secretly recorded by the Haganah. Similarly, the efforts of Haifa's Arab leadership to scaremonger their hapless constituents into fleeing though reluctant in the extreme to do so, is well documented. Some Arab residents received written threats that, unless they left town, they would be branded as traitors deserving of death. Others were told they could expect no mercy from the Jews.

In the words of a British intelligence report: "After the Jews had gained control of the town, and in spite of a subsequent food shortage, many would not have responded to the call for a complete evacuation but for the rumours and propaganda spread by the National Committee members remaining in the town. Most widespread was a rumour that Arabs remaining in Haifa would be taken as hostages by [the] Jews in the event of future attacks on other Jewish areas: and an effective piece of propaganda with its implied threat of retribution when the Arabs recapture the town, is that [those] people remaining in Haifa acknowledged tacitly that they believe in the principle of a Jewish state."

Nor was this phenomenon confined to Palestinian cities. The deliberate depopulation of Arab villages, too, and their transformation into military strongholds was a hallmark of the Arab campaign from the onset of hostilities.

As early as December 1947, villagers in the Tul Karm sub-district were ordered out by their local leaders, and in mid-January, Haganah intelligence briefs reported the evacuation of villages in the Hula Valley to accommodate local gangs and newly arrived ALA forces.

By February, this phenomenon had expanded to most parts of the country, gaining considerable momentum in April and May as Arab forces throughout Palestine were being comprehensively routed.

On April 18, the Haganah's intelligence branch in Jerusalem reported a fresh general order to remove the women and children from all villages bordering Jewish localities. Twelve days later, its Haifa counterpart reported an ALA directive to evacuate all Arab villages between Tel Aviv and Haifa in anticipation of a new general offensive. In early May, as fighting intensified in the eastern Galilee, local Arabs were ordered to transfer all women and children from the Rosh Pina area, while in the Jerusalem subdistrict, Transjordan's Arab Legion ordered the emptying of scores of villages.

To sum up, Zionism needs no propaganda to buttress its case, yet the historical truth needs to be reclaimed after decades of relentless distortion.

We love you, Charles

At an intimate birthday dinner in Jerusalem at the end of May, the president of Israel, Shimon Peres, had a formidable task. The golden-tongued Peres had to honour a personal friend of 60 years, a man who is a cherished friend to Israel, the Jewish People, and citizens of Canada and the United States. He had to find a fresh and meaningful way to capture the emotions in the room as we toasted a visionary philanthropist who has been honoured again and again with honorary doctorates, the Order of Canada and honorary citizenship status from Jerusalem.

Smart and sophisticated enough to know that, sometimes, it is best to trust simplicity and sincerity, Peres, brimming with emotion, welcomed Charles Bronfman to the exclusive club of vital, vibrant, inspiring octogenarians, and said: "We love you, Charles." Peres' soft-spoken delivery and Polish-accented "r," elongating the name nobly, made the name "Charrrrles" sound like the loftiest of titles.

And it's so true.

We love you, Charles, as Montrealers, because of the devotion you showed the city during its darkest hour. By keeping the Montreal Expos alive when you did, you were investing in the city where your father launched your legendary family's many heroic accomplishments. And by supporting McGill and Concordia universities so generously, you helped Anglo life continue to thrive, not just survive.

We love you, Charles, as Canadians, because your Canadian foundation's CRB Heritage Minutes not only educate

Gil Troy

Canadians about the past but offer a model of public education, proving that not everything popular and compelling need be superficial or stupid.

We love you, Charles, as Americans, because, spurred by your beloved late wife, Andrea, you helped us heal after the mass murders of Sept. 11. Andy's initiative, "The Gift of New York," giving free museum, culture, and sports tickets to 9/11 families, not only embraced the families brutalized by Islamist terrorism, it helped revive the New York cultural scene after the mass trauma, reminding Americans to define New York by the institutions that make it live, not the evil-doers who marked so many for death.

We love you, Charles, as Israelis, because your Keren Karev is like a magic wand waved up and down the country, making once-ugly sites beautiful and turning seemingly intractable social and educational problems into opportunities to help people by pioneering creative, cutting-edge solutions.

We love you, Charles, as Jews, because your Taglit-Birthright Israel program has now launched more than 250,000 Jewish journeys at a critical time in the life of Israel and the Jewish People.

Like a brilliant matchmaker, you and your fellow philanthropists brought together Jews from communities scattered throughout the world – craving inspiration – with Israel, a country oozing with inspiration, but increasingly misunderstood by Jews and non-Jews who judge it harshly from afar rather than experiencing and embracing it up close.

And in your typical style, you've followed through on the unexpected consequences of this bold experiment, pioneering through your Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies in New York programs for the oft-overlooked and neglected Jewish 20-somethings, who deserve creative, open-minded and dynamic programs tailored to their unique characters.

Of course, this is only a sampling of Bronfman's art of giving, the many amazing projects he has shared with the world. That such a miracle man is such a mensch, mastering the art of living, too, is even more impressive. I have seen how gentle, modest, and accessible he is with Birthright participants, flustered by meeting the great man, yet immediately put at ease by his charm. And I vividly remember the first time, he, and the lovely but formidable Andy, along with their dog, Yoffi, first hosted an obscure young academic in the majestic Montreal headquarters of Seagram's a decade ago. The warmth, the respect and the openness conveyed at our first meeting also set me at ease, launching me on one of my great life adventures: helping with Birthright's educational programming.

And so for your kindnesses and your accomplishments, your greatness and your heimishness, I echo the president of Israel's plain but profound words: we love you, Charles – and happy 80th birthday.

The text chooses the teacher

In a scene in the first Harry Potter book, young Harry is about to buy his first wand. He enters Olivander's and tries a few out. The first is too weak. The second is too strong. Then Olivander spies a wand on the top shelf, gives it to Harry, and suddenly there is a warmth, and a glow, and Harry's true magical prowess is manifest. Olivander peers over his glasses and says, "The wand chooses the wizard, Mr. Potter. It is not always clear why."

The books' author, J.K. Rowling, explains, "This is due to the unique character of each wand, which must match that of the wizard, as the wizard may not be able to perform magic if his and his wand's characters conflict, or the magic may be sub-par to magic performed with the wizard's own wand... a wand, in my world, is merely a vehicle – a vessel for what lies inside the person."

I think about this as we celebrate Shavuot, the holiday of teaching and learning – sometimes called "the scholar's festival." I celebrate it each year by staying up all night teaching and studying at the downtown Toronto tikkun, where hundreds of people across the religious spectrum just want to study Torah.

The text is a Torah teacher's wand, and with it, we can do magic. When it's the wrong text, no amount of fancy footwork, and no clever anecdotes, can make it right. When it's the wrong text, no sparks fly.

Try as we may, bend it and twist it, it's as if we and our wand are in conflict, and the magic always feels sub-par. The text chooses the teacher. It is not always clear why.

Teachers must have their wands at the ready. We teach our best when we know that the text is merely a vehicle – a vessel for what lies inside us. But just as a text chooses its teacher, a text will find its way into the heart of a student, I believe, with or without a teacher's guide. When the student is ready, the text appears. The trigger event that brings an adult into the classroom, or to a Tikkun Leil Shavuot, the moment of recognition of an inability to master a Jewish subject and the need to remedy the situation, that's enough to open the door and for a text to come flying in. But a Dumbledore is needed to contain the flying text and help students see themselves in it.

I think rabbis put too much stock in the fortuitous melding of North American culture and the Torah portion, and in finding the intriguing and "fun" ways that we can share the text with our congregants or students. It creates tremendous stress from July until after Simchat Torah. It makes us compete with one another across synagogue bulletins, websites and sermonic sharing engines. It makes us

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

strive to "one up" ourselves on the last great sermon we gave. It makes us sometimes, sadly, forget the text itself, or bend it into an unrecognizable shape, or lose our hold on the text altogether. It makes us wave our wands furiously, trying to ignite a magic that's already there.

The text chooses the teacher, but that leaves us with profound insecurity and difficult questions. What do I do if I'm drawn to teach a text that is so problematic, so ethically challenging, so disturbing that the magic it produces is dark and dangerous? What do I do if I've been teaching for so long, giving the same sermon for so long, that I feel as if my wand is wearing thin from overuse? And what do I do with my magic if everyone else in the room full of students is a muggle, a person wholly unfamiliar, uninterested and unmoved by the magic of Torah? Or even frightened by it?

There's something magical about several hundred people packed into rooms studying Torah all night, no matter what they study. There's something even more magical as the sun comes up and the last sturdy few reflect on how much they've learned. It's the teachers who do magic, but the students who take that magic and change the world. The text chooses the teacher, but without students, Hogwarts is an empty castle.

The flotilla and Israel's blockade of Gaza

Later this month, an international flotilla of about 15 ships is scheduled to set sail from Turkey and various European ports to yet again challenge Israel's naval blockade of the Gaza Strip, thereby setting up a possible reprise of a deadly incident that occurred in the Mediterranean Sea last year. On board the vessels will be 1,500 protesters from 22 non-governmental organizations and some 100 countries, including Canada and the United States.

In last year's violent confrontation, which took place on May 31, Israel ordered the flotilla – organized by a Turkish charity and condoned by Turkey – to head for the port of Ashdod and unload its cargo of food and medical supplies. When the flotilla disregarded the command, Israeli commandos boarded the lead ship, the Mavi Marmara, a vessel registered in Turkey, and fighting broke out. By day's end, eight Turkish nationals and one Turkish American citizen had been killed.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Although the Israeli Navy stopped the protesters from reaching Gaza – whose land and sea borders Israel has controlled since its unilateral withdrawal six years ago – the incident was decidedly a setback for Israel. Under global pressure, Israel was forced to ease the blockade, which pro-Palestinian voices have described as illegal and a collective punishment inflicted on the 1.5 million inhabitants of Gaza. The incident also strained Israel's pivotal but frayed relationship with Turkey, prompting the Turkish government to recall its ambassador in Tel Aviv. The net result was an implicit victory for the Palestinians and their allies, whose stated objective is to tear down the blockade, which Israel considers vital to stem the flow of weapons and munitions into Gaza.

In an attempt to discourage pro-Palestinian activists from launching the second flotilla at the end of June, Israel has vigorously lobbied governments around the world. Israel has won the support of many governments and the secretary-general of the United Nations, Ban Ki-moon, but has failed to enlist Turkey's co-operation.

Rather than trying to defuse tensions, the foreign minister of Turkey, Ahmet Davutoglu, the architect of its new alignment with Iran and Syria, exacerbated the situation. Until recently, he claimed he had no legal way to stop the flotilla, but last week, he suggested that the organizers should reconsider their plans. Before his volte face, he had urged Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to end the blockade and apologize and pay compensation for the deaths of the nine Turks in 2010.

In what amounts to a war of words with Turkey, Israel's deputy foreign minister, Danny Ayalon, who publicly humiliated Turkey's ambassador to Israel in a bizarre encounter early in 2010, has warned that the flotilla will be waylaid by the Israeli Navy if it heads for Gaza, which was seized by Hamas four years ago this month.

According to reports, Israel intends to use lethal force only as a last resort, focusing on riot control methods and snipers to maintain order and neutralize violent protesters.

The Israeli government is acutely aware that Israel may well face a public relations disaster should it fire on protesters. Among them are a famous African American novelist who compares flotilla passengers to 1960s Freedom Riders in the United States who rode buses to combat racism and segregation in U.S. southern states, and an Israel Air Force pilot who refused to participate in combat missions in Gaza at the height of the second Palestinian uprising.

Ahmet Davutoglu

Israel imposed the blockade for essentially three reasons: to weaken Hamas, whose charter calls for Israel's destruction; to end rocket attacks from Gaza, which started in 2001, and to win the release of Gilad Schalit, an Israeli soldier kidnapped by Palestinians who stormed an Israeli border post in 2006.

In actual fact, Israel began subjecting Gaza to closures and restricting the movement of its residents long before the blockade was implemented. Israel adopted these measures after the outbreak of the first Palestinian uprising in 1987. Several years later, in 1994, the Israeli government built a security fence separating Israel from Gaza, as well as five border crossings: Erez, Rafah, Karni, Keren Shalom and Sufa. Israel took these steps under the terms of the Oslo accords.

The Turkish boat Mavi Marmara in 2010

With the eruption of the second Palestinian intifadah in 2000, Israel tightened the screws on Gaza. After Israel's pullout from Gaza in 2005, the United States brokered a deal regulating the movement of people and goods between Israel and Gaza.

Prior to Israel's evacuation of Gaza, Israel and Egypt signed an agreeement pledging to work together to foil terrorism and arms smuggling, and prohibited cross-border activities.

The Rafah crossing on Israel's border with Egypt enabled Palestinians in Gaza to move back and forth. But after Hamas' takeover of Gaza and the resumption of rocket barrages against Israel, Egypt closed the Rafah terminal, much to the objection of Egyptian popular opinion.

Egypt's president, Hosni Mubarak, who was overthrown in February following an 18-day revolt, had reason to co-operate with Israel. He feared that Hamas-style Islamic militancy might spill into Egypt and thereby embolden the banned Muslim Brotherhood and increase Iran's influence in the region.

Additionally, Mubarak regarded the closing of the Rafah crossing as a tangible sign of Egypt's solidarity with Fatah, the Palestinian faction Hamas ejected from Gaza in a coup. The closure, though, was deeply resented by the Palestinians of Gaza. In 2008, they clashed with Egyptian police in an attempt to reopen the Rafah crossing.

In all probability, Hamas orchestrated the violence, hoping it would induce Egypt to stop co-operating with Israel. The ploy worked. Egypt relaxed border regulations, but also began building a steel barrier along the frontier to prevent illegal crossings.

With the 2008-09 war in Gaza, Egypt and Israel closed all crossings, allowing only food and medical supplies to enter. The Palestinians accused Israel and Egypt of strangling Gaza's economy, creating a humanitarian crisis and turning Gaza into an open-air prison.

After the first flotilla, however, Israel and Egypt eased the blockade. Israel permitted a large range of products into Gaza, but inexplicably, innocuous goods such as light bulbs, books, clothing and mattresses were sometimes barred. Israel, generally, did not allow construction materials into Gaza, fearing they would be used by Hamas to rebuild its military capabilities. But Hamas handily circumvented these rules, using a network of tunnels to smuggle in contraband materials.

On May 28, the new Egyptian government officially reopened the Rafah crossing, but left some existing restrictions in place. By then, border regulations already had been loosened.

With the launch of the second flotilla fast approaching, some Israelis think the time has come for Israel to disengage from Gaza completely. They argue that the blockade should be lifted, that the land crossings should be closed and that Israel should divest itself of the responsibility for provisioning Gaza. As Shlomo Avineri, the former director-general of Israel's foreign ministry, has observed: "Gaza is a foreign country. It is hard to digest this, but this is the logic of disengagement, which must now be completed."

CHAT student says 'Yes I Can'

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Micaela Lechtman, 18, has advice for kids with challenges, particularly learning disabilities. "It will get better," she says. "Once you understand what your challenges are, it's easier to get the help to overcome them."

The Grade 11 student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto recently received a "Yes I Can!" award from the Council for Exceptional Children's Toronto Chapter 56.

In addition to her learning issues, Lechtman has had to adapt to major changes in her life. The first was at age two, when she was adopted from a Nicaraguan orphanage by Montreal therapist and community leader Shulamit Lechtman. More recently, in December 2008, her mother died of cancer and she moved to Toronto to live with her aunt and uncle. The move meant not only a new city and a new school, but living for the first time in an observant Jewish household.

"Throughout these potentially traumatic events, Micaela has conducted herself with great dignity," wrote her teacher Judit Kenyeres, head of the special education and remediation department at TanenbaumCHAT's Wallenberg Campus on Wilmington Avenue, in a recommendation for the award. "In the past three years we have had the great pleasure of witnessing a young girl mature into a young, confident woman who has impressed us with the progress she has made in all domains."

For Lechtman, one of the most daunting aspects of moving to Toronto was TanenbaumCHAT's size. "The school is ginormous!" she said. But students were warm and welcoming, and always asked if she needed help to find her classes, she added.

Kenyeres noted in her letter that Lechtman often reaches out to other special needs students herself. She told The CJN that Lechtman helps them in a light-hearted way that provides "a happy social context."

Before she moved to Toronto, Lechtman – who is leaning toward a career in the social work field – had never attended a Jewish day school.

But, she said, her Judaism has "never been just a minor detail of who I am." Observing Shabbat and kashrut "wasn't foreign," she added. "You learn, and you ask."

Among Lechtman's favourite subjects are rabbinics and Tanach, which are taught in English. "I love learning, generally," she said, adding that she particularly enjoys creative writing. In addition to her regular classes, she takes learning strategy and remedial classes.

Her aunt, Marilyn Lechtman, noted that because of Micaela's upbeat personality – evident in her sunny smile – "you don't get the real truth about how difficult it was. I think the change was enormous and the challenges were very large."

SENSORY EXPERIENCE: Montessori Jewish Day School students, from left, Liv, Hannah, and Kayla helped plant the school's new 10th anniversary sensorial garden on May 31. The plants and flowers develop students' senses and help them learn how to care for the outdoor environment.

Syrian border claims taken at face value

A well-known media cliché, "If it bleeds, it leads," was certainly in evidence early last week in stories about the June 5 protests at the Syrian-Israeli border. Reflecting what really happened, headlines could have read, "Syria distracts attention from its crimes, marshals Palestinians to the border." But what captured media attention was the result of Syria's stratagem: a colourful, sensational, violent confrontation.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

"Israel fires at Palestinians protesters," was the Globe and Mail's headline in its June 6 world section. A similar story in the National Post that day appeared under the title, "Israel fires on border protesters."

Both relied on Reuters and the New York Times, but the differences were significant.

The Globe's piece carried the byline of Reuter's Allyn Fisher-Ilan. Fisher-Ilan began: "Israeli troops fired at Palestinian demonstrators in Syria who also rushed to the frontier fence in what Israel called a challenge to its sovereignty. Syrian state-run media said 23 were killed."

Are readers to trust Syrian media reports – that is, coverage from the same state-run media that deny the Assad regime's gruesome massacres?

Fisher-Ilan noted that Israel accused Assad "of permitting" the protests as a distraction from internal upheaval. In fact, Israel accused Assad of orchestrating the protests. Nothing happens at the otherwise quiet and heavily controlled border without the regime's consent. (This deeper truth was picked up in the Post's June 7 follow-up story, "Israel calls protests a Syrian ploy".)

Yet in Fisher-Ilan's version, several hundred Palestinians assembled after a "Facebook call" to march on the border, even though it had been reported several days before that Syria had disabled the Internet to thwart internal protests. The report also failed to state that Israeli soldiers took measures to avoid fatalities, such as firing over the heads of protesters who defied the warnings, and then aiming for the legs. In short, the careful preparations of the IDF to minimize casualties were largely absent. The impression left was that of Israeli aggression against unarmed Palestinians.

The National Post's story, while also relying on Reuters, gave more weight to a report by Isabel Kershner of the New York Times.

Kershner made a point of including the IDF's measures: "An Israeli military spokesman speaking on condition of anonymity under army rules, said that 'despite numerous warnings, both verbal and later warning shots in the air, dozens of Syrians continued to approach the border.' She said the soldiers tried to disperse the crowds with non-lethal means, including tear gas, but that did not deter them."

Speaking of deeper truths, New York Times columnist David Brooks' June 3 piece, "The Depravity Factor," asked why anyone who is not morally obtuse would have confidence in the Assad regime's willingness to be a reliable partner for peace. Calling Syria "fundamentally depraved," Brooks is scathing about western politicians who believe Syria can be sweet-talked into becoming a "pro-western, civilized power" or that its president, Bashar Assad, can, or has any interest in, "reform."

A regime that kills 1,000 of its citizens and arrests and tortures thousands more, including a 13-year-old boy whose mutilated body was returned to his parents as a warning to all, should be beyond the pale internationally. Yet the United Nations can't even manage to issue a condemnation.

On the issue of moral blindness, it was disturbing to read Malise Ruthven's "Storm Over Syria" in the June 9 issue of the New York Review of Books. Ruthven argued that despite its brutality, the Assad regime's "achievements should not be forgotten or ignored." Ignoring Syria's long and ugly history of tormenting its Jews, Ruthven commended what he called "the regime's commitment to religious freedom." Ruthven's perverse conclusion speaks for itself: "It would be tragic if the pursuit of democracy led to the shredding of this bright human canopy, where religious and cultural differences seem to have flourished under the iron grip of a minority sectarian regime."

On second thought, moral blindness may be too complimentary a term for such grotesque sentiments.

Only in the impossible reality of the State of Israel can two days – contradictory in their power and their emotions – fall side by side on the calendar: Yom Hazikaron (Remembrance Day for the fallen Israeli soldiers and victims of terrorism) and Yom Ha'atzmaut (Independence Day).

This impossible reality is part of my life to this very day, joy mixed with sadness. For many, especially in the Diaspora, the Six Day War, in 1967, is considered a heroic victory of young and tiny Israel over significant Arab armies who threatened to destroy it.

The days before the Six Day War were nerve-racking. My mother was pregnant with me. Father had been sent to the Jordanian front, and no one knew of his fate. Eventually, he returned home. But many of his friends did not.

Barely six years passed and suddenly one of the cruellest wars of Israel's history broke out: the Yom Kippur War. It lasted for three weeks on the Egyptian front and, essentially, for several months on the Syrian front. By war's end, more than 2,600 Israeli soldiers were dead; 7,300 wounded and nearly 300 were captives, most of them in Egypt.

I will never forget the moment when, at the end of the war, my mother found the courage to tell her six-year-old boy that two of our neighbour's sons had been killed on the Egyptian front. "God is taking care of them now, and they take care of us", she said as she wiped her tears.

Years later, I met a girl who is now one of my best friends. Her father was killed in the Yom Kippur War. On Yom Hazikaron, I called her, as I do every year, just to be there for her.

"How are you?" I asked.

She replied in a calm and sad voice: "My childhood ended at the age of five and that was really not fair. I miss him and I miss my childhood."

The years passed.

Then, in 1982, the first Lebanon War broke out. Merely weeks later the memorial walls of my high school were inscribed with new names. Only yesterday, it seemed, they were Grade 12 students, young, laughing, with life fully ahead of them. Then came the war and cruel destiny ruined it all.

My wife had an uncle she never knew. He was killed in Lebanon years before her birth. "What would he be if he was with us today?" she often asks herself.

More than 22,500 men and women sacrificed their lives to ensure the existence of the one and only state of the Jewish people. They did so out of loyalty for their country, love for their families and also out of a sense of belonging to world Jewry, of trying to help secure the one place on Earth that belongs to all Jews and that would be there for them were they to need it.

Most Israelis living in Canada have stories and memories from the wars of Israel. Among us are individuals who lost family members, friends and classmates. Each of us is exposed to bereavement and pain.

One of the Israeli poems that most touches my heart on that day is One Human Tissue, written by Motti Hammer and performed by Chava Alberstein. Some of the poem's words are, to me, the essence of the Israeli narrative on Yom Hazikaron: "Because all of us,/ Yes all of us/ all of us are one living human tissue./ And if one of us passes on/ something dies within all of us/ and something of him remains."

Most of those who attended the Yom Hazikaron ceremony last month in Toronto were members of the Israeli community. We came to honour the memories of our relatives, friends and colleagues. We also came to honour our heritage and our values. It is a day of unity and solidarity.

Adding to the sadness that day, we felt the absence of the members of the local Jewish community. Indeed, in some quarters that absence evoked strong criticism.

So that all of us – Israelis and locally born members of the Jewish community – must build a common future and become "One Human Tissue." We must get to know each other and our distinct cultures better, but mainly, and most importantly, we must become aware of both our needs and sensitivities.

Israelis regard Yom Hazikaron as a day of supreme importance, a day of self-examination, of pain, of sadness and of longing. We ask you, the non-Israeli members of the Jewish community in Canada, to share our pain and the pain of the State of Israel, the state, after all, of the Jewish People. Inasmuch as the State of Israel is the state of all Jews, so too should all Jews try to empathize and understand the pain that is felt so strongly by Israelis.

I ask that next year, please make a note of the date of Yom Hazikaron. It is the date immediately before Yom Ha'atzmaut.

I also ask that you join us in commemorating Yom Hazikaron. Come with us to honour those who are no longer here but would be but for their sacrifice in defence of Israel.

Bamidbar: the power of names

Rabbi Sharon Sobel

We're now in the middle of reading Bamidbar, the Book of Numbers. In Hebrew, Bamidbar actually means "in the wilderness." It's replete with long lists of names of the Israelite tribes, the individual clans and families that make up those tribes, and the numbers of people in every tribe, clan and family. Why is it so important for us to hear all of those names, year after year, generation after generation?

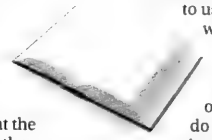
Names in Jewish tradition are extremely significant and powerful, because it's our name that will give us a place in history, and it's our name that will be our legacy.

A midrash tells us about the significance of names: "All people have three names: one their parents give them, one that others call them, and one they acquire themselves. And the one they acquire themselves is most important of all."

The name our parents give us is the first name we are called – the name that appears on our birth certificates, passports and drivers licences. But when parents give their children a name, they give them much more than a label or title. They give them their inheritance, the one left to them by the person for whom they were named.

The great philosopher, Franz Rosenzweig once said, "One should be named after somebody or something, or else a name is really only an empty breath." The name our parents give us is our special connection to the past. It takes that empty breath and fills it with life, life that has been handed to us by those who came before.

Rabbinic Reflections



The midrash tells us that the second name we have is the name we're called by others – the honour or ill-repute that deservedly or undeservedly is ascribed to us. Rabbi Simeon said: "There are three crowns: the crown of learning, the crown of priesthood and the crown of royalty, but the crown of a good name exceeds them all." The name we're called by others teaches us that our names are not only our connection to people of our past, but also to people in the present.

But the name others call us isn't the last word. The midrash tells us that the final gauge of who we are is the name we acquire for ourselves. This means a great deal in a world where we have little control over our looks, talents or how we sound when we speak. This tells us that we are the creators of our most important name, that we have the ability to create an enduring legacy for ourselves, and that no matter how much we like or dislike the name our parents gave to us, no matter how much we agree or disagree with the name others call us, we must acquire the most important one for ourselves. How do we do this? By our aspirations and the way we fulfil them, by the deeds we perform, by the way we live our lives and by our connection to God.

So during this season of reading Bamidbar – this season of counting, numbering and naming – let us remember that each of us is blessed with the gift of a wonderful and unique name.

Rabbi Sharon Sobel is rabbi of Temple Kol Ami in Thornhill, Ont.

Lessons of caution for the minyan

The Torah readings at this time of year narrate the arrival of Israel at the border of the land and Moses sending spies to scout the land. The incident of the spies isn't a shining moment in our nation's history. Out of 12 scouts, only two return with true information. The other 10 speak slanderously about the land.

There is much for us to learn from these spies. Most importantly is the question of whether we resemble the two honest scouts, Joshua and Caleb, or the 10 maligning ones. The subtleties of text will help us answer this question.

This incident will decide the future of the Jewish people. We will wander in the desert for 40 years because of this incident.

This episode is also the basis for our word minyan, the quorum of Jews required to say elements of holiness during prayer. Ten spies gathered together into a "congregation"" and lied. These spies were all adults and all male. From this model, the sages develop the minyan of 10 adult Jewish men. Joining a minyan and being able to say Kaddish in a minyan is crucial to so many Jews in their daily lives, whether religiously observant or not. Yet we don't always remember that the minyan represents us in the Torah at our worst, not at our best.

In fact, an entire nation is going to detour from its destiny because of the actions of these 10. There is also an ensuing battle, resulting in the defeat of Israel and many casualties. The effect of these 10 men spans from the national to the individual, from the monumental to the mundane.

Midrashic Moments

Rachel Turkienicz

These spies are also quite strategic with their answers. They don't immediately begin by defaming the land and then continuing with a long list of condemnations. After all, this is the land that God promised, so care should be taken before verbally trashing such an essential component of the Covenant. The sages teach us that the spies reported positively about the land. It is indeed wonderful and flowing with milk and honey, they report. But although the land is to be praised, the inhabitants are another story. The people are giants and warriors and fierce and unforgiving. The strategy is to agree with God while creating paranoia about God's creations.

Clearly, we can see how this could work on a global level, yet the sages teach us how this is the strategy of our mundane reality as well. This is the strategy of anyone who speaks slander of another. First they begin by speaking well of someone, so you will be caught off guard with agreement. Only then do they turn and speak ill of this person.

The caution and the subtle connection to minyan is one of the underlying messages. We anticipate that a quorum of Jews gathered for elements of holy prayer would encompass the best of us. We are taught that it does not. We assume that a minyan is the creation of holy space where only the positive and good will be shared. We are again taught that it is not.

In fact, it seems the sages are sending us words of caution. It's when we gather together for holy purposes that we must keep our focus tight and our speaking of each other with only praise and merit.

Rachael Turkienicz is director of rachaelscentre.org.

Minimalists and maximalists

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

I've been using the terms "minimalist" and "maximalist" in this column for awhile now. They deserve an explanation.

The terms refer to an ongoing debate by biblical scholars over the historicity of the Bible, the uses of archeology to prove the Bible, and the dating of the biblical stories. Minimalists believe that the Bible was composed more recently and that the earlier biblical stories are mythic in nature, with very little historical support. Maximalists tend to accept the historicity of the Bible

In its recent manifestation, this confrontation can be dated to the early 1970s, but the debate goes back even further, to the latter part of the 19th century. It was then that the German biblical scholar Julius Welhausen came up with his controversial hypothesis, which applied the ideas of literary criticism to the biblical text.

Welhausen believed that the biblical text was composed by a number of authors and that it reached its final form during and after the Babylonian captivity. That implies that writing was virtually unknown in ancient Syria and Canaan until the first millennium BCE.

Then along came a number of spectacular archeological discoveries that were made after World War I, which called Welhausen's hypothesis into question. They included discoveries of ancient cities with textual archives. Most of these discoveries were found in Syria.

These sites included Ugarit, which was located on the Syrian coast opposite the island of Cyprus. It was here that the first alphabetic texts were found. Both the Ugaritic language and script were almost identical to biblical Hebrew but dated from a period roughly equivalent to the time of Moses' grandfather, 1400 to 1200 BCE.

The other Syrian site that called into question Welhausen's late dating of the biblical text is the ancient city of Mari. It dates to an even earlier period than Ugarit and was destroyed by the legendary Babylonian king, Hammurabi, sometime during the 18th century BCE. The Mari texts mention a number of Canaanite cities, most notably Hazor, whose disputed destruction during the conquest of Canaan has been attributed to Joshua.

It was the great American biblical scholar William Foxwell Albright and his disciples who used these, and other discoveries, to build up a coherent theory supporting the early dating of the biblical text. This reached its culmination with the publication of A History of Ancient Israel, written by John Bright, one of Albright's pupils.

By the time of Albright's death in 1971, his theories were under attack from a number of quarters. By the mid-1970s scholars such as Thomas L. Thompson, John Van Seters and Donald Redford were questioning his ideas.

But then the vagaries of archeological discovery began to push the pendulum in the other direction. In 1993, at Tel Dan in northern Israel, an inscription from the ninth century BCE, which mentioned the "House of David," was found. More recently in 2009, an inscription from the 10th-century BCE was discovered, showing, once more, the impact of new discoveries on existing theories. Yet throughout these debates what has always remained steadfast is the message of the Bible and its impact on humanity.

Entebbe + 35

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Thirty-five years ago, the world was riveted by a drama that began in the eastern Mediterranean with the hijacking of Air France Flight 139. It culminated seven days later with the spectacular rescue by the Israel Defence Forces in Entebbe, Uganda.

Maj. Louis Williams has written a good summary of the events leading up to the raid and its successful completion. The IDF senior press officer's "Entebbe Diary" follows the jet as it took off from Ben-Gurion Airport on June 27, 1976, "on what promised to be a routine flight to Paris via Athens." This is a suspenseful read, full of details that may have been forgotten over the years. [http://bit.ly/enteb01] I also recommend the Wikipedia entry on Entebbe. [http://bit.ly/enteb02]

You can now read excerpts of the recently released transcript of Israeli cabinet deliberations in the days leading up to the raid. Defence Minister Shimon Peres, Foreign Minister Yigal Allon, Prime Minister Yitzchak Rabin and others assess the gravity of the situation and grapple with what seemed like a no-win situation. Peres: "The heart-wrenching question is whether we [should] risk the lives of innocent unarmed civilians, and save the future of this country, or not. If we surrender, the respect for terrorism will grow." Your chance to be a fly on the wall as history was being decided. [http://bit.ly/enteb03]

Several theatrical docudramas were created about the kidnapping and raid, but you don't really need actors to feel the emotion when you watch the documentary Operation Thunderbolt: The Entebbe Hostage Rescue. At just under an hour, it includes interviews with key Israeli politicians as well as with the hostages who tell of those traumatic and then joyful days. [http://bit.ly/enteb04] Israeli hostage Sara Davidson: "Someone shouts 'Israeli soldiers!'... We lift our heads slowly with disbelief, and we see the most magnificent sight of our lives... A short soldier... He looks at us calmly and says, 'Halt. Are you all right? Come on, we came to take you home.'"

One of the names most closely linked to the raid on Entebbe belongs to Jonathan Netanyahu, older brother to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. "Yoni" led the storming party to free the hostages and was the lone Israeli military casualty. The fully bilingual site includes a biography, photographs and Yoni's battle record, as well as an opportunity to "light" a memorial candle and leave a note with your thoughts. Visitors to the site are greeted by this verse from 2 Samuel 1:25: "How the mighty have fallen in battle! Jonathan lies slain on your heights." [http://bit.ly/enteb05]

On the fateful day of the hostages' liberation, July 4, 1976, Rabin addressed the Knesset: "The Israel Defence Forces have achieved one of their most exemplary victories from both the human and moral and the military-operational points of view, a remarkable manifestation of Jewish fraternity and Israeli valour... The operation that rescued our dear ones from captivity will be a subject for research, for song and for legend, and it will be written about in the annals of the nation." [http://bit.ly/enteb06]

Next week, the legacy of the rescue.

Rights commission won't intervene in taxi case

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Had Arieh Perecowicz known he never had a chance in his complaint to the Quebec Human Rights Commission (QHRC) over carrying religious items in his taxi, he never would have agreed to his out-of-court settlement last March.

"There is absolutely no way I would have done it," a resigned and disappointed Perecowicz, 67, told The CJN. "No one – not the lawyers, not Quebec Jewish Congress, nobody – ever told me that my commission case would automatically be dropped.

"Otherwise, there is no way I would have agreed to it."

Last month, the Cote St. Luc cab driver got a letter from the QHRC notifying him that because his case was settled out of court, the QHRC could no longer deal with it.

"[I]n accordance with the provisions of Section 77.1.2, of the [Quebec] Charter [of Human Rights and Freedoms], the commission shall cease to act on your behalf in this case," the letter stated.

Section 77.1.2 refers to the QHRC having no jurisdiction when a complainant reaches an out-of-court settlement through mediation, according to the Charter's section 49 and 80.

In the settlement negotiated between his lawyers and the Montreal Taxi Bureau, the bureau issued a directive allowing taxi drivers to carry religious items.

In exchange, Perecowicz dropped an impending pro bono appeal to Quebec Superior Court over his Municipal Court conviction last February on four tickets he'd received for having items in his cab – including Jewish religious ones – unrelated to his job.

Also as part of the deal, Perecowicz's conviction stood and he still had to pay more than $1,000 in fines, but four outstanding tickets were cancelled.

Until the QHRC letter came, Perecowicz continued to believe that the Charter religious discrimination issues that meant so much to him would still be dealt with by the commission, where he had filed a separate complaint more than four years ago seeking several thousand dollars in compensation.

"But I can't do anything now," Perecowicz said.

Agency preserves B.C.'s Jewish voices

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — If you want to learn about the Jewish history of British Columbia, the oral history collection at the Jewish Historical Society of B.C. (JHSBC) is a good place to start.

In an effort to preserve the province's Jewish voices, the society has been conducting oral history interviews since 1971, an effort spearheaded by historian Cyril Leonoff and Irene Dodek.

Over the past 40 years, more than 700 interviews have been recorded, making this the largest oral history collection of any Jewish institution in Canada.

The first 500 early interviews were done with a tape recorder, a fragile form of magnetic media that is nearing the end of its lifespan. But thanks in part to a recent $6,900 grant from the Irving K. Barber B.C. History Digitization Project, the JHSBC has begun the process of digitizing its oldest interviews to preserve their integrity and increase their accessibility before their content is lost.

This project will be the first large-scale effort to digitize the society's Oral History Collection, said JHSBC archivist Jennifer Yuhasz.

"As many of the interviews were recorded throughout the province of British Columbia and pertain to people's lives in various countries and cities, the JHSBC collection has a provincial, national and international interest to researchers worldwide," Yuhasz said.

All the interviews and their transcription are done by volunteers, and presently the society has five dedicated to those tasks, conducting approximately 30 interviews each year.

"We transcribe the interviews because although we want to have the original audio and preserve that for as long as possible, we also want a transcript of it for people who are deaf, or for those who don't want to listen to it," Yuhasz said. "We couldn't do this without our volunteers. It's really a community and volunteer based program."

The society's mandate is to document Jewish life in British Columbia, and though the vast majority of interviewees are Jewish, the mandate includes non-Jews who have significant connections to the province's Jewish life.

"Anyone can nominate someone to be interviewed," Yuhasz said. "Generally, we interview older people only because they have a longer life story to talk about, and we want to interview them before they pass away. But the mandate is very general: we strive to record the diversity of the Jewish people of B.C., the significant contributions they have made to B.C. history and the stories of their lives and everyday events."

The society has approximately 3,000 hours of interview time in its archives, and each interview is catalogued, indexed and made available to researchers.

Montreal teens aid flood victims

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Human Promise, a Jewish teens group associated with Quebec Jewish Congress, raised $18,000 to assist victims of the devastating floods in the Richelieu Valley.

Members of the group went to St. Jean-sur-Richelieu to present the donation.

"We have been raising funds for children's causes [abroad] for almost six years," said spokesperson Ariel Shapiro.

"For the first time, we were challenged to find a way to assist victims of a local disaster. The response has been overwhelming. In a short time, we raised a significant sum thanks in large part to Jewish community leaders like Federation CJA president Jack Hasen."

The federation contributed $12,000, double what the teens collected.

"We should always remember that charity begins at home. We have donated to victims of the Chinese and Haitian earthquakes and feel a special obligation to help our neighbours affected by the floods. We encourage all Quebec teenagers to volunteer or to hold their own fundraising events," Shapiro said.

The Human Promise students also served a bagel lunch donated by Jewish businesses to SOS Richelieu volunteer workers.

"The plight of the Richelieu Valley flood victims has especially touched us," Hasen said. "When we were asked to assist our teenagers in this initiative, we did not hesitate. We are proud of our young generation of caring teens who have worked to make this donation a reality and we congratulate them on their efforts on behalf of their fellow Quebecers."

Marie Bouillé, the member of the National Assembly for Iberville, thanked the young people.

"On behalf of all victims of the floods, I wish to express how deeply moved we are for this gesture of unity and solidarity from Jewish community teenagers... They have demonstrated that in the face of the enormity of this natural disaster, the only words that matter are unity and solidarity."

The Human Promise funds programs that provide disadvantaged children with educational, health, nutritional and emotional support. It has raised tens of thousands of dollars for humanitarian causes and sensitized youth to human rights issues in Canada and around the world.

NDP leader says MPs can support flotilla

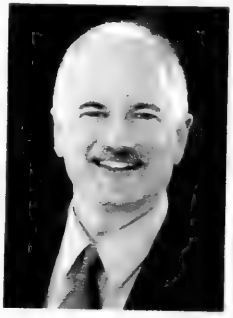
According to a statement of claim – which outlines a plaintiff's cause for action – the suit also seeks to block the defendants "from sending goods, funds or any other material support, directly or indirectly, to Hamas or any of its representatives, and/or from aiding and abetting Hamas by assisting in bringing imports and exports to and from the Gaza Strip."

The Canadian Boat to Gaza website says individuals belonging to numerous Canadian organizations, including the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, the Canadian Arab Federation and the Quebec solidaire political party, among others, plan to send a Canadian boat called the Tahrir to the Gaza Strip as part of this year's Freedom Flotilla, which is expected to depart later this month.

Last week, two NDP members of Parliament, Alexandre Boulerice and Alex Atamanenko, representing the ridings of Rosemont-La Petite-Patrie and B.C. Southern Interior respectively, were listed as supporters of the Canadian Boat to Gaza on the group's endorsement page.



Jack Layton

Boulerice later removed his signature from the page after NDP leader Jack Layton publicly announced it was party policy not to endorse the flotilla. As of The CJN's deadline, Atamanenko was still a signatory.

However, Layton told CBC News last week that although the party doesn't support the flotilla "initiative," individual NDP MPs can support it if they wish.

"We're a diverse party and people have different points of view," he said.

The NDP had not responded to The CJN's requests for comment at deadline.

The flotilla will reportedly comprise some 15 ships from several countries and comes a little more than a year after Israeli marines stormed the Mavi Marmara, the flagship of an international aid flotilla bound for Gaza, killing nine Turkish activists.

"The Canadian boat's raison d'être is to aid and abet the terrorist organization that rules Gaza," Sher and Morgan said in their statement.

Rosenberg's lawsuit also seeks $1 million in damages "for trauma and injuries suffered as a consequence of the defendants' conspiracy" from the time she lived in the Israeli town of Sderot, where she "endured the constant and relentless mortar attacks emanating from Gaza."

"During these terrifying attacks, Ms. Rosenberg was forced to seek shelter, along with members of her family and, like other victims of these wanton attacks, has been traumatized and shocked, suffering from the serious symptoms of post traumatic stress disorder," her lawyers said.

The lawsuit represents an "evolution of people's response to this cynical public relations stunt," Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, told The CJN.

"We've seen people challenge the credibility of the flotilla initiative. Leaders of countries, UN Secretary General [Ban Ki-Moon] and even Turkish Foreign Minister [Ahmet Davutoglu]... have challenged the utility and legitimacy" of the flotilla, Fogel said.

He added that the case further represents a "push-back" against those who wish to perpetuate "myths that cloud the core challenge of getting the Palestinians to come to the table in direct negotiations with Israel."

When asked for a reaction to the lawsuit, Ehab Lotayef, a spokesperson for the Canadian Boat To Gaza, replied by e-mail: "No comment. We have not been served with any claim (only heard about it through media reports)."

At deadline, Rosenberg was out of town and unavailable for comment, Morgan said.

Alleged Paris shul bomber granted bail

Compiled by CJN Staff

Terror suspect Hassan Diab was granted bail Saturday by a Toronto court and was to be released from custody this week.

An Ottawa judge allowed Diab's extradition to France earlier this month to face charges of murder, attempted murder and destruction of property in the Oct. 3, 1980, bombing of a Paris synagogue.

The bomb exploded outside the Rue Copernic Synagogue during a Shabbat service, killing three French men and one Israeli woman. Dozens were injured.

Diab, a 57-year-old Canadian of Lebanese descent, was arrested in Ottawa in 2008 in response to a request from France.

As under his previous bail conditions, he remains under strict surveillance, but he's now allowed to visit his lawyer in Toronto for up to 72 hours and has had his curfew extended by an hour, to 10 p.m.

The Crown opposed his release, calling him a flight risk.

Diab, a former sociology professor at Carleton University and the University of Ottawa, must be surrendered under Canadian law, but the Ottawa judge said France had presented "a weak case" that makes the prospect of his conviction "unlikely."

Stamps in Diab's 1980 passport indicated he was not in France at the time of the bombing, Associated Press reported. But his handwriting allegedly appears on a hotel registration card, evidence his lawyers have vigorously disputed.

French analysts compared his handwriting with that on the registration card, but three French handwriting experts testified the analysis was flawed and didn't match Diab's.

The appeals process could delay Diab's extradition for years.

Students head to Vienna to celebrate Jewish life

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Twelve Canadian students travelled to Vienna last month to celebrate the past, present and future of Viennese Jewish life, as well as promote the overall goal of "Jewish global partnership."

Hillel Canada director Samuel Konig said the purpose of the trip was for students to immerse themselves in and make connections with another Jewish community.

The nine-day trip included a guided tour through Vienna's "Jewish Quarter," meetings with Canada's ambassador to Austria, John Barrett, Israeli Ambassador Aviv Shir-On, Holocaust survivor Karl Pfeifer, and a tour of the Mauthausen concentration camp.

Erin Dessau

"There were a lot of discussions about Holocaust reconciliation, and we also dealt with the issue of the resurgence of Jewish communities in Europe," Konig said.

"Vienna is a good example, because after the war, Vienna went from a [Jewish] community of nearly 200,000 to 1,000, but now, it is one of the most sophisticated communities in Europe."

He said it was fascinating to see a small Jewish community of 8,000 with such a strong infrastructure that included a Hebrew school, 19 shuls and six kosher restaurants.

"[The students] were surprised that there were six kosher restaurants, because Calgary doesn't even have a kosher restaurant, and they have about the same amount of Jews."

The trip, which was sponsored by Hillel Canada and the Jewish Welcome Service Vienna, an organization dedicated to promoting the Jewish community that has thrived since the end of World War II, also addressed stereotypes that Jews might have about the German-speaking city.

Aviva Atlani, a 32-year-old PhD student at the University of Western Ontario currently writing her dissertation on Holocaust humour, said the trip succeeded in presenting students "with an idea of what Vienna was like and is like," and it also helped facilitate dialogue.

"I was struck by the fact that the Austrian youth take the lessons of the past so seriously, and they wholeheartedly work not to repeat the mistakes of their ancestors. I was very impressed by that," Atlani said.

Atlani said she has a special connection to Vienna, with family members who currently live in the city and Viennese ancestors who perished in the Holocaust.

She said that her great-grandfather's three sisters lived in Vienna before the war.

"Two of them, we know for sure, were deported from Vienna to a concentration camp called Maly Trastsianiets" in a small village on the outskirts of Minsk, Belarus.

During her free time in Vienna, Atlani searched through archives.

"I found birth records, marriage records, and it was very interesting."

She said that while she was aware of her family history prior to her trip, "it is still impressive when you see it in the books and see it recorded. To see the handwriting and see the inscriptions... it makes the past very present."

Erin Dessau, a McMaster University psychology student, said she didn't know what to expect from the Viennese Jewish community.

The 19-year-old student, who serves as the Jewish Student Association's vice president of social action and president of Israel on Campus, said she noticed differences between the Jewish communities in Toronto and Vienna.

She said that while Vienna's community is ethnically diverse, all but one of the 19 shuls are Orthodox.

"In Toronto, we have different sects of Judaism – there are Conservative shuls, Reform shuls, Orthodox shuls – whereas there, they are all Orthodox shuls, but they separate themselves depending on where they come from," Dessau said.

She said she was also impressed by the community's resolve not to let the Holocaust define them.

"It's part of their history, but it's a part of their long history and it doesn't consume them," she said.

"The fact that the focus of the trip was on the past, present and future of Judaism in Austria was really important, because you can go on trips that are Holocaust based, but if that is all you're going to learn about, then it's all you'll think about. You won't think about the culture that's there today and the history before 1939."

Memories of Israel — especially the falafel

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

It's been 20 years since my first trip to Israel, when three generations of my family hopped aboard an El Al plane to visit my youngest daughter, who was studying at Yeshiva Neve Yerushalayim.

I remember choking up when we stood on a certain hill looking out over the sacred city, feeling both saddened and giddy as I left a note in a crevice at the Western Wall, watching bar mitzvah boys praying with their parents, and then later, feeling elated as I climbed all the way to the top of the majestic Masada, floated on my back, in the salty Dead Sea and purchased a painting in the magical city of Safed.

It was a historic, memorable bus tour all over the country with my mom, dad and daughters, filled with as much politics as pleasure, with a massive dose of enlightenment thrown in. But the funny thing is that, years later, what we reminisce about the most is an unremarkable stop that our driver insisted on making, even though it was 20 kilometres out of his way, because he just had to show us something.

It still brings an ironic giggle and a sigh when one of us says, "Remember that falafel stand in the middle of the desert, just to the left of nowhere? It was the best! That sesame sauce. And those pickles – I can still taste it."

The inevitable responses: "Why can't we go there again?"

"Because we won't be able to find it."

"Come on, it was right outside of Jerusalem, near Bethlehem."

[The Book of New Israeli Food]

"No, it wasn't. It was on the way to Haifa."

"No, we were going to the Dead Sea." And so it goes…

Wherever it was, what we do remember is that the pita was steaming fresh, the falafel had a slight crunch and then melted in your mouth, the pickles had just the right amount of burn, the tomatoes were sweet as the summer, the cucumbers were crunchy for days, and the techinah dressing – I kept going back to that glass pitcher, drowning my falafel in that addictive sesame flavour, pouring out a third helping, then a fourth. I couldn't get enough. I don't know if it was the best meal we had in Israel but it was the most indelible.

The bad news is that we were on an organic bus trip and our kindly driver seems to have disappeared, so that even though, on subsequent trips – both in reality and in our minds – we've tried retracing our steps to that stand, it's been to no avail.

The good news is that because we all fell in love with the ubiquitous street snack, I've spent the last 20 years trying to recreate those flavours, and in the process, come to realize there is no dish as much fun to make. There are umpteen condiments you can pack into a pita, most of which begin with the word "Israeli," and everybody, from my four-year-old granddaughter to her 94-year-old great-grandparents, loves to eat falafels. Falafels feel like family. They feel like our homeland, Israel. And when we eat them, we always feel as though we're celebrating and, at the same time, appreciating our culture and heritage.

LEBANIS HUMMUS

Adapted from Chef Ariel Kars and co-owner Patric Felsenstein, Naomi Grill, Madrid, Spain. Sautéed mushrooms may be substituted for the meat.

Humus
2 cups dried chickpeas
1 cup sesame tahini (sesame paste)
5 cloves garlic, halved
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. lemon salt
1/2 tsp. black pepper
Meat
1/2 lb. baby lamb chops, 1st or 2nd cut, sliced
2 medium red onions, peeled and chopped
1/2 tsp. dried oregano
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. black pepper
1 tsp. sumac (fruit-based Israeli spice)
1/4 cup olive oil
2 tbsp. pine nuts
Garnish
1 cup flat-leafed parsley
1 tsp. red chili pepper flakes
1 tbsp. olive or more if needed

To make the hummus, sift through chick peas, rinsing well and discarding pebbles or broken or discoloured peas. In a large bowl, soak peas for 8 hours or overnight. Rinse and place them in a heavy soup pan with 2 quarts of water. Bring to boil. Lower heat and simmer for about 1-1/2 to 2 hours or until very tender. Drain well, reserving cooking liquid. Cool slightly.

Grind cooked peas, garlic, tahini and spices in food processor. Add about 1 cup water a little at a time, as needed and blend until very creamy.

To make meat, marinate meat with onions, spices, pine nuts and olive oil and let sit overnight. Sauté meat until tender.

To serve, spoon hummus onto a serving plate, spreading it so that the edges are thicker than the centre. Scoop out a circle in the centre. Place meat in centre, sprinkle with parsley and pepper flakes. Drizzle with olive oil. Serves 6.

THE DAHAN FALAFEL

From David Dahan, owner of Dahan Catering, Rockville, Md.

This is the traditional way falafel is made in Israel.

1 cup dried chickpeas or 1 16-oz. can chickpeas, cooked and drained
1/2 cup yellow onion, chopped
2 cloves garlic, chopped
3 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley or cilantro or a mixture of both
1 tsp. coriander
1 tsp. cumin
2 tbsp. flour
salt and pepper to taste
vegetable oil for frying

In a large bowl combine chickpeas, garlic, onion, coriander, cumin, salt, pepper and flour. Put beans in a food processor, pulsing until it becomes a thick paste. Form into small balls, about the size of a walnut, about 1-1/2 in. in diameter. Flatten slightly. In a large, deep frying pan heat about 2 inches of oil to medium hot, about 350. Deep fry a few at a time until golden brown, about 5 to7 minutes, turning over once. Serve warm. Makes 12 to 16 falafel balls and will serve 4 to 5 people.

TECHINAH

From The Book of Jewish Food by Claudia Roden (Knopf)

1 cup tahini (sesame paste)
juice of 1 to 2 lemons
2 or 3 cloves of garlic, crushed
salt
1/2 tsp. paprika
2 tbsp. finely chopped flat-leafed parsley

Pour tahini into a bowl and very gradually beat in the lemon juice and enough water to make a pale, thick cream. Keep beating. It will thicken into grainy lumps at first, before it blends into a thin cream. Add garlic and salt to taste. To use as a dip, garnish with paprika and the parsley. To use as a dressing, beat in more water until it reaches the consistency of a light cream.

UJA Federation OF GREATER TORONTO

Jewish Family & Child — Every step of the way

Richard Cummings

Toronto's Jewish community once again gathered in force last Sunday for our annual Walk with Israel. It is notable that ours is a community that steps out for Israel and steps up to meet the needs of the vulnerable here at home. This is clearly apparent in the case of Jewish Family and Child Service of Greater Toronto, known today as Jewish Family & Child or JF&CS, a prominent UJA Federation partner agency and a Toronto fixture since its founding in 1868. Today, we keep our community and children safe, we contribute to its mental health and wellness, and we address the effects of poverty.

Indeed Jewish Family & Child is a remarkably progressive and responsive social service agency that reflects the Toronto Jewish community's commitment to transformational philanthropy and effective partnership with key community organizations. So, as we recently came out in force to declare our support for Israel and our strong presence as a community, we had much to celebrate locally. Jewish Family & Child's commitment to be there "every step of the way" can only be fulfilled because the requisite vision and resources have been allocated by a community that recognizes the imperatives of safety, security and healthy development. Funding support comes from three primary sources: UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, United Way Toronto and the Ontario provincial government. We are proud, along with UJA Federation, to extend the good works and the reach of the Jewish community so effectively to our government and United Way stakeholders.

Community growth is a positive force but it also implies a host of social challenges. In response to those challenges there are few communities that can boast the assets of ours. Jewish Family & Child's capacity to make a difference has grown in recent years. Features of the agency's increased capacity include a growing and strategic emphasis on client centred service. Service to the community is enabled and enriched by a wonderful synergy with our agency partners and with UJA Federation. A compelling example is the JPAG (Jewish Poverty Action Group) program, designed to help families break the cycle of poverty that casts a shadow on their lives. This program was featured in a recent CJN report. Jewish Family & Child, along with Jewish Immigrant Aid Services ofToronto, Kehilla Residential Program and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, came together in recent years to exercise visionary leadership in developing the JPAG program. Our goal was to respond more effectively to the circumstances that so often predict and sustain poverty. A powerful feature of JPAG is its financial support for educational opportunities, helping not only with tuition but providing further support to ensure that an adult family member can take the requisite time away from primary employment to pursue educational advancement. With the right support and opportunities, these individuals can increase their income and improve their quality of life. Through its innovative approach to positive social change, JPAG has created unique and meaningful opportunities for individuals – opportunities that give a hand up rather than a hand out.

Jewish Family & Child's mission is to support the healthy development of individuals, children, families and communities through prevention, protection, counselling, education and advocacy services, within the context of Jewish values. We honour our mission through best practice, evaluation and research. We strive to be an agency in which impact is effectively measured, felt and communicated, where all stakeholders are treated with respect and dignity, where our work features a consistently high level of staff commitment and skill development, and where services are client centred.

We endeavour to achieve our strategic goals in a manner that enriches our Jewish community. Jewish Family & Child plays a crucial role as a platform to actualize UJA Federation's strategic priorities, prominent among which is Jewish affiliation. Through the support of UJA Federation and its agency partners, we provide funding and opportunities to vulnerable members of the community for participation in Jewish events, services, meals and fellowship. As a children's aid society we ensure a Jewish response to child abuse and neglect, and guarantee a Jewish upbringing to children brought into our care. It is to say the least, uplifting, to attend a bris or a bar/bat mitzvah for a young person in our care. These are "our" kids, the community's kids. Jewish women affected by domestic violence know that they can come to us to at a dire time of need. This sense of affiliation and the certainty that we all belong in our Jewish community, are treasures that are made possible and leveraged through a vital, robust Jewish Family & Child.

Guest Voice

Two weeks ago I visited Calgary, Alta. to attend the Association of Jewish Family & Children's Agencies (AJFCA) annual conference. Agencies with similar mandates from across North America, representing all major cities on the continent, presented an array of material to those attending. What stood out in bold relief was the strength of the relationship between Toronto's UJA Federation and Jewish Family & Child. The sense of co-operation and collaboration, the generosity reflected in our annual funding allocation and the shared values that shape our partnership are seen as a model of agency /federation relations. It is with great appreciation and an abiding belief in the power of good partnerships that I share this good news.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Exercise helps increase function after stroke

We all know that active living is necessary for maintaining good health throughout your lifetime, and that being active is beneficial for both your mental and physical well-being.

A new study published in the New England Medical Journal found that after you've had a stroke, exercise plays a vital role in your recovery. Researchers also found that the intensity and frequency of the exercise were more important than where you performed it or even how long you waited after the stroke to start. The results showed that it didn't matter whether you started rehabilitation exercises two months or six months after the stroke, the improvement was the same and resulted in an increase in balance, walking capability and functional ability.

Many studies show that once you have had a stroke or a mini-stroke, the chance of your having another one increases by 20 per cent. The risk of falling quadruples, and the chance of breaking a hip is 10 times greater.

Exercise, even during the chronic phase post-stroke, can be beneficial and lead to an improvement in heart function, endurance, mobility, mental and physical health, as well as overall quality of life, the study showed.

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

And 52 per cent of participants saw an increase in walking ability, speed, balance and function within 12 weeks of starting the study.

Rehabilitation exercises after a stroke are designed to help you regain as much of your independence as possible, but they can also help reduce the risk of another stroke. Exercise can also lower blood pressure and help the body maintain a healthy level of insulin.

Fewer dropouts were reported in the home-based program, compared to the facility's specialized treadmill training group.

There's a positive connection between aerobic activity and functional ability. Everyone should participate in aerobic exercise on a regular basis to improve function, speed and endurance. Stroke survivors should engage in 20 to 30 minutes of aerobic activity, modified according to individual needs and abilities, at least five times a week to really see the benefits.

Palestinian unity in peril

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Hamas militant group on Sunday rejected the rival Fatah movement's nominee for prime minister, complicating plans to unify the duelling governments in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and jeopardizing international aid for the Palestinians.

Hamas' opposition to Salam Fayyad's nomination marked a key setback in the reconciliation process, which aims to form a caretaker government until elections are held next year. Since the rival factions announced their reconciliation pact last month, aiming to end a four-year rift, they appear to have made little progress in implementing the program.

Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salam Fayyad

Fatah and Hamas are set to meet this week in Cairo to begin the process of appointing members of the new government. It was not clear whether Hamas' announcement Sunday was a final decision, or a bargaining tactic as the sides gear up to fill cabinet posts.

Fayyad, the prime minister of the West Bank-based Palestinian Authority, was nominated by the western-leaning Fatah over the weekend to remain in his post.

A U.S.-educated economist, Fayyad enjoys the respect of foreign donors. President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah has concluded Fayyad's reappointment would ease western concerns that donor money would fall into the hands of Hamas, which the West considers a terrorist organization.

Fayyad is a political independent, but Hamas believes he is nonetheless a political figure.

Hamas official Salah Bardawil told the Associated Press on Sunday that "Hamas will not agree to grant Salam Fayyad the confidence to run the national unity government."

Fayyad's office declined comment. Officials close to Abbas said they believe Hamas' announcement was not final and expressed hope they would still be able to get Fayyad's appointment approved. Hamas has floated several names but not yet announced a formal candidate.

Fatah and Hamas have been at loggerheads since the Islamic militant group won parliamentary elections in 2006. A short-lived unity government disintegrated the following year, with Hamas routing forces loyal to Abbas and overrunning the Gaza Strip. Since then, Abbas has governed in the West Bank only.

The two factions have been divided over how to deal with Israel. Fatah favours peace with Israel, while Hamas has rejected international demands to renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist.

Last month, Fatah and Hamas signed a deal in Egypt to end their rift and join together in a caretaker government. But implementation of the power-sharing deal has moved slowly.

Fearing international pressure on Hamas could jeopardize hundreds of millions of dollars in international aid, they have committed to putting together a cabinet comprised entirely of apolitical technocrats. It remains unclear when they will be able to agree upon a slate of cabinet ministers that is acceptable to the international community.

Liberate land from enemy: Lebanon PM says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Lebanon's Prime Minister Najib Mikati announced on Monday a long-delayed new government dominated by allies of Iranian-backed Hezbollah, which is likely to cause alarm among western powers.

Mikati was appointed to form a government after Hezbollah and its allies toppled western-backed former prime minister Saad al-Hariri's coalition in January over a dispute involving the UN-backed tribunal investigating the assassination of statesman Rafik al-Hariri, Saad's father.

"Let us go to work immediately according to the principles and basis that we have affirmed our commitment to several times, namely... defending Lebanon's sovereignty and its independence and liberating land that remains under the occupation of the Israeli enemy," Mikati said at the Baabda Presidential Palace.

Political wrangling had held up the formation of the cabinet, including disagreements over sensitive posts.

Hariri, who is supported by the West and Saudi Arabia, has refused to join Mikati's government.

A main aim of the government will be to agree on a unified stand to face indictments by the tribunal expected to implicate members of Hezbollah in the 2005 killing of Hariri. The group denies any link to the attack.

Mikati, who says he is politically neutral, said the Lebanese government would seek to maintain positive ties with all Arab countries.

Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, who has been fighting a popular revolt against his 11-year rule, telephoned Mikati to congratulate him, Lebanese media said. Syria is a strong ally of Hezbollah, the main player in the political coalition that helped bring Mikati to power in January.

"This government is committed to maintaining strong, brotherly ties which bind Lebanon to all Arab countries without exception," Mikati said.

Syrian refugees tell of atrocities

THE SYRIAN-TURKISH BORDER — Refugees fleeing the restive north-Syrian city of Jisr al-Shughour continued to flood the Turkish border Sunday, bringing with them chilling accounts of the atrocities taking place in Syria.

"It's impossible to tell who is against whom," Mohamed Hashnawe, who arrived at the Turkish border in an abandoned ambulance, told Ha'aretz.

Hashnawe, a student from Jisr al-Shughour, said that he drove the ambulance with 22 other refugees on board. They reached the passage near the town of Al-Hamsya, where they were met by Turkish police.

The police took them to a new, recently erected refugee camp made of hundreds of tents, some of which have already been occupied.

"Soldiers are shooting other soldiers that have refused to shoot at civilians," Hashnawe said, yet another testimony proving that the 120 soldiers Syrian state television has claimed were killed by "armed gangs" were in fact executed for their refusal to kill opponents to Syrian President Bashar Assad's regime.

Syrian soldiers have continued their rampage on Jisr al-Shughour, attacking nearby northern towns as well.

Silmanya Mohamed Migdan, a Jisr al-Shughour resident who fled to Turkey late Saturday told Ha'aretz that at 5 a.m. the day before plainclothes police officers surrounded the town.

Three hundred civilians were able to flee the north Syria town, however security forces managed to shoot at the elderly who were unable to escape, killing at least one man who was 70 years old.

The region near Turkey's border has a history of hostility toward the Syrian regime and is posing the biggest challenge yet to President Assad's struggle to crush the anti-government revolt. Thousands of Syrians in the region have crossed into Turkey in recent days, taking sanctuary in refugee camps.

A senior Turkish diplomat said 4,300 Syrian refugees had crossed the border and were being cared for in hospitals and camps, but a Western diplomat said the number was higher and witnesses said some 10,000 were sheltering near the border.

Mosque torched and vandalized

Palestinian security sources have blamed Jews for torching a mosque in a West Bank village. Burning tires were rolled into the mosque in the Maghayer village near Ramallah, setting rugs in the building on fire, according to reports. The building sustained fire damage. No deaths or injuries were reported. The mosque's walls also were sprayed with graffiti that reportedly read "Alei Ayin" – the name of a nearby settlement outpost that was demolished recently by Israeli police. Several West Bank mosques have been torched in the last year. Most of the incidents were blamed on Jewish settlers. A joint Israeli police-military investigation has been launched into the incident. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Shimon Peres condemned the mosque's desecration.

Clashes on Temple Mount

Israeli police quelled stone-throwing on Jerusalem's Temple Mount last Friday. Police entered the compound, known to Muslims as the Haram al-Sharif, after stone-throwers targeted Israeli troops who secure the area's margins. The police used tear gas to subdue the rioters and arrested three people, Israeli media reported, quoting police. No one was injured. Stone-throwers have in the past targeted worshippers at the Western Wall, directly below the compound. It wasn't clear what prompted the rioting, but a number of Palestinian groups have called for a third intifadah.

Israeli dairy cows most productive

Israeli dairy cows produce more milk than dairy cows in other countries. The Israeli dairy cows produced an average of nearly 2,642 gallons of milk a year in 2009, according to data released by the Central Bureau of Statistics. By comparison, dairy cows in the United States produce 2,465 gallons of milk per year and European Union cows 1,622 gallons per year, according to the Jerusalem Post. There is an estimated 25 per cent increase in the purchase of dairy products by Israelis in the days leading up to Shavuot, when Jews traditionally eat dairy holiday meals. A cow from Kibbutz Karmia near Gaza was named the highest milk-producer for the second year in a row, giving more than 20,000 litres or about 5,283 gallons of milk in one year. There are 125,000 dairy cows in Israel, and the average Israeli consumes about 45 gallons of dairy products a year.

Turkish PM wins third term

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Turkey's state-run television announced on Sunday that the ruling party of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan had won a third term in parliamentary elections.

The TV station's website, TRT, carried the following headline: "Turkey decides to continue with AK Party."

AKP is the Turkish acronym for the ruling Justice and Development party.

State TV said that with 98 per cent of the results counted Sunday, the ruling party had received about 50 per cent of the votes. The Republican People's party, the main opposition group, had 26 per cent and another opposition party, the Nationalist Action party, 13 per cent.

A Muslim democracy and a candidate for the European Union, Turkey has become an economic powerhouse and an influential player on the global stage since Erdogan's AK party first swept to power in 2002.

AK will now be forced to seek agreements with other parties to press on with plans to replace the existing charter, written almost 30 years ago during a period of military rule.

Based on a preliminary count, Erdogan's party was set to win around 327 seats in the 550-member parliament, less than the 330 needed to send a new constitution to a referendum.

This will take some of the gloss off the AK success in winning a third consecutive term and four more years of single party rule, but analysts suggested that it would be good for both the economy and democracy in Turkey.

"It seems the election outcome is heading toward the best-case scenario for the markets: a solid majority for AKP but short of the 330-plus seats required to amend the constitution and put it to a referendum," said Wolfango Piccoli, an analyst at Eurasia Group risk consultancy in London.

"Falling short of 330 seats, the AKP would be forced to enter into negotiations with the opposition for the desired changes – a scenario that should help to limit the risk of further polarization," he added.

There were no significant reports of trouble during the election, even in the restive Kurdish region, where a strong showing by independents fielded by the pro-Kurdish BDP played a big part in denying the AK's advance.

Erdogan's support has been built on his success in creating a booming economy and in ending decades of chaotic coalitions, military coups and failed international financial bailouts.

Recep Tayyip Erdogan

The only doubt hanging over Sunday's vote had been over the margin of Erdogan's victory, given the goal of a new constitution.

There has been speculation that Erdogan will seek to move Turkey toward a more presidential system of government, with the ultimate aim of becoming president himself.

Erdogan, whose party evolved from banned Islamist movements, says the new charter will be based on democratic and pluralistic principles that will bring Turkey closer to EU standards.

Turkey and Erdogan's AK are often cited as models for supporters of democracy living through the "Arab Spring" in parts of the Middle East and North Africa.

While foreign investors have traditionally seen AK as the most market-friendly party, Erdogan's critics say he has an authoritarian streak.

Opponents point to rampant use of wiretaps by state agencies, the detention of journalists critical of the government, nepotism and a widening gap between rich and poor.

Analysts have warned the new government will face sobering economic challenges. The current deficit is ballooning, fiscal policy needs tightening to cool overheating, and youth unemployment is high in a country where the average age is 28.

Int'l scholars group condemns U.K. academic boycott

JTA

LONDON — Scholars for Peace in the Middle East has condemned Britain's largest academic union for voting to adopt an academic and cultural boycott of Israel.

The international organization also condemned the University and College Union (UCU) for rejecting the European Union definition of antisemitism.

The resolution was passed May 29 at UCU's annual conference. It's the union's third such vote since it was established in 2006.

The board of directors of Scholars for Peace in the Middle East said in a June 7 statement that it "strongly condemns the Union of College and Universities vote on May 29, 2011 to promote the campaign to academically boycott Israel, despite advice from its own legal counsel, which has advised it may be a illegal action based on discriminatory practices as well as being well beyond the scope of the charter of the union."

The statement also strongly condemned "UCU voting to disassociate itself from the European Union working definition of what constitutes antisemitism on May 30, 2011, which signals to all that the union does not take antisemitism seriously. In rejecting this working definition, the UCU is promoting a hostile, antisemitic study and work environment for Jewish and Israeli students and faculty in colleges and universities throughout the U.K. who support the right of Israel to exist within safe and secure borders and who challenge those who would demonize, delegitimize and hold Israel to a double standard despite, the union's protestations and rationalizations to the contrary."

Scholars for Peace in the Middle East represents about 55,000 university and college professors, researchers, administrators, teachers, librarians, and students on more than 3,500 campuses worldwide, according to its website.

Chavez demonizes rival for his Jewish roots

Jasmina Kelemen
JTA

LOS TEQUES, Venezuela — As someone who has spent his entire political career opposing Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, Gov. Henrique Capriles Radonski is accustomed to rough handling.

But even he was taken aback by the viciousness that erupted two years ago outside the yellow walls of the old colonial home that now serves as his government seat.

"They came here and they called me Nazi, even though my grandmother was in the Warsaw Ghetto," he said, his voice rising. "My great-grandparents were killed in a concentration camp. My grandmother's mother and father were killed by the Nazis in Treblinka."

By "they" he means the red-clad mob, led by the city's pro-Chavez mayor, who chanted "Nazi fascist!" and sprayed red swastikas onto the outer walls of the Casa Amarilla (Yellow House) in 2009.

Since taking office three years ago as the governor of Venezuela's second-largest state, Miranda, Capriles has become a lightning rod for antisemitic attacks from the state's most radical corners even though he says he is a fervent Catholic and subject to what he describes as a campaign of "permanent sabotage" by the government.

Capriles, 38, last month declared his intention to seek the nomination to run as the opposition candidate against Chavez, who will be running for his third consecutive term.

Recent surveys show that the lanky Capriles, a grandson of Holocaust survivors who does not identify himself as a Jew, is the most popular politician in Venezuela.

Sensing its best opportunity to defeat Chavez as the nation struggles with rampant crime, double-digit inflation and deteriorating services, the opposition for the first time has agreed to unite behind a single candidate chosen in a primary scheduled for February.

This makes Capriles the opposition's most credible chance of defeating Chavez since he assumed power 13 years ago.

"He represents the next generation of Venezuelan political leaders," said Ricardo Hausmann, director of Harvard University's Center for International Development, and a former Venezuelan minister of planning. "He honed his political skills during very conflicted times and has been able to garner support from a very heterogeneous voting bloc."

Capriles is used to confronting the government. He was imprisoned in 2004 for 120 days for charges related to his activities as mayor of a middle-class district of Caracas during the 2002 coup attempt against Chavez. After several trials he was exonerated, allowing him to move on from mayor to governor.

In 2008 he defeated a powerful Chavez ally to lead Miranda, which has nearly three million people. His victory unnerved the government by finding thousands of new votes in the overcrowded slums surrounding Caracas, which traditionally voted with

Gov. Henrique Capriles Radonski

Chavez's United Socialist Party of Venezuela, or PSUV. Incensed at the loss of such a key state, Chavez immediately ordered the central government to take over Miranda's hospitals.

By presidential decree, Chavez dismantled the state's infrastructure, taking over police units, asphalt plants and state employees, slashing budgets and crippling the governor's ability to effectively administer power.

To many it looked like revenge, an attempt to paralyze a potentially dangerous political foe. However, the effort seems to have backfired. Some polls are showing that as many as three out of four voters are blaming the Chavez government and not Capriles for reduced services.

Capriles notes that while he believes he was targeted by the Chavez government, all of Venezuela's states, regardless of their political affiliation, have had their powers diminished by the central government.

"Chavez has won through elections, but his daily maneuvering isn't democratic," Capriles told JTA. "The challenge is to democratically overcome a government that isn't democratic."

Chavez does not usually refer to his opponents individually but has begun telling the nation it must be vigilant against political elements "looking to set the nation on fire."

Shortly after Capriles announced his intention to run, Chavez warned that the opposition was planning to destabilize the nation. Such remarks harked back to 2002, when the opposition tried to overthrow his presidency and carried out a devastating strike in the national oil industry.

In an interview with a local private station, Chavez said he was sure he would win.

"If they don't kill me or some other catastrophe doesn't occur, I'm certain – though there will be much work to do – that I will be re-elected for six more years," Chavez said earlier this year.

While Chavez's approval rating has dropped from its peak level of about 80 per cent, he still commands the support of about half the electorate. The half that is against Chavez is fractured among the opposition candidates.

Chavez has benefited as well from more than a decade of political organization at the grass-roots level, and he remains popular among many members of Venezuela's underclasses.

Capriles argues that he can more effectively bring about the social improvements Chavez has promised. Acknowledging that Chavez has brought attention to the vast inequalities that separate Venezuela's rich and poor, Capriles says Chavez is too ideologically driven to successfully manage the nation.

Capriles' non-ideological focus on improving lives has found a receptive audience among many who have grown tired of Chavez's tirades and a seemingly growing list of unfulfilled promises.

In the last few weeks, rolling power outages again have struck the nation, resulting in citywide rationing in Caracas and beyond. In 2009, Chavez claimed the blackouts were due to a drought that severely curtailed the nation's hydroelectric capabilities. This year, the blackouts are occurring after months of unusually heavy rains have displaced thousands of people throughout the country.

"[Chavez] has in his hands all the tools to make this country function, and if he did so everyone would support him," said Josefina Arias, 36, a vendor who described herself as a former Chavez supporter.

Arias had gathered with several hundred other people at Casa Amarilla to receive state-funded vouchers worth about $3,000 to repair her rain-damaged cinderblock home.

"There are many people who want this country to change," Arias said. "Unfortunately, I believe that Chavez has lost his vision of what Venezuela could be."

While voicing her own disenchantment with Chavez, Arias noted that many in her family still support the president. They fear that if the opposition wins, Chavez's social programs, like providing subsidized groceries or free clinics, may be reversed.

Many expect an ugly electoral fight ahead, warning that Chavez is unafraid to use the full force of the state's considerable media and financial resources against his enemies.

"Chavez, of course, has every interest in sowing conflict among the opposition, and he will have considerable resources to do so," said John Carey, a political scientist at Dartmouth College.

For Jews, this could mean the resurgence of antisemitism that many hoped had been put to rest through recent overtures made by the president toward the community.

Despite the fact that he says he's Catholic, Capriles consistently has been the target of antisemitic attacks. During the governor's race in 2008, state media described him as a member of the "Jewish-Zionist bourgeoisie" and "genetically fascist."

Though the campaign hasn't officially begun, the state press continues to refer to Capriles as Jewish. Observers say that may be an attempt to generate opposition against him.

"We have already begun to see a species of feint referring to him as Jewish, which we believe is an attempt to carve out the votes of anti-semites and especially anti-Israel [voters]," said a Jewish representative who asked to not be identified. "The campaign hasn't even begun yet, but we're sure there will be [antisemitic] attacks."

Local Venezuelan Jews say Capriles has "very good relations" with the community, even though he doesn't identify spiritually with it.

"Because of my mother and grandmother, for Jews I'm Jewish, but I'm Catholic," Capriles said.

While he no longer has a religious connection to the Jewish community, their story of survival affects him deeply, he says.

Conference examines Jews and capitalism

Elliot Jager
JTA

JERUSALEM — Why are so many Jews discomfited by capitalism – and not merely by the caricature of capitalism as rapacious speculation and exploitative profiteering but by the very idea of organizing an economy along free-market lines?

The question was among many addressed at a conference on "Free Markets and Social Progress," held in Jerusalem in late May. Sponsored by the Jerusalem Institute for Market Studies (JIMS), the conference took as its premise the indisputable fact that free-market countries tend to foster the kind of liberty and tolerance that have enabled Jews to thrive. Why then, are many Jews inclined toward liberal and left-wing political ideologies that denigrate the free market?

One longstanding theory holds that the sticking point lies in the historical connection between money and the aristocratic hierarchies of power that, especially in Europe, were heavily tinged with antisemitism. There is surely something to that – and yet Jews would probably not have survived into the modern period, let alone the post-modern period, without their own genius for making money. That genius was manifestly aberted by the breakdown of those old hierarchies, a breakdown facilitated by, precisely, the spread of modern capitalism.

Isaac Lifshitz

Is it just a matter of bad branding on the part of capitalism's defenders? That was the thought of Russell Roberts of George Mason University, speaking at the conference. To Roberts, promoting smaller government for the sake of letting taxpayers keep more of their own money is a poor strategy. Too often, this position is perceived as unfair, boorishly self-centred, and, for Jews in particular, antithetical to the now-sacrosanct imperative of tikkun olam.

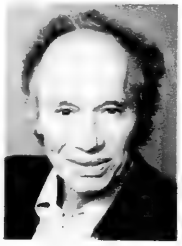
Instead of hitching the free-market idea to the wagon of low taxes and smaller government, Roberts would emphasize the way in which collective social interests are best furthered not by government regulation but through an "emergent order of co-operation" that transcends both government and market forces alike. For instance, in the United States, unlike in Israel, government does not regulate religion, with the result that Americans enjoy a vibrant marketplace of religious ideas. In contrast, Judaism in Israel, tethered to the state, has suffered grievously.

What does Judaism itself have to say about the free market?

What does Judaism itself have to say about the free market and social and moral progress? Take the issue of charity and generosity. Roberts believes that when left to their own devices, people will co-operate with each other in ways that go beyond commerce, doing better not only for themselves but for their fellow human beings. In other words, the liberty inherent in the free-market system actually encourages both charity and generosity.

Provocatively, the philosopher Joseph Isaac Lifshitz of the Shalem Center preferred to emphasize a distinction rooted in Jewish thought: the distinction between pure charity, which he sees as lying "outside the market," and the "generosity" that consists in helping others enter the market.

As Lifshitz explained, Judaism accepts that in any choice between oneself and one's neighbour, putting oneself first is perfectly legitimate; indeed, the biblical commandment to "love aathy neighbour" cannot be fulfilled without a healthy dose of self-interest. Lifshitz would thus have us think of investment – specifically on the micro level – as a normative good. An investor may profit, but morally what matters is setting one's "neighbour" on the path toward financial self-sufficiency.



Sam Peltzman

One can expand the point to the macro level. After all, Jewish survival has historically depended not on individual charity but on communal prosperity, and precisely the kind of prosperity fostered by investment that is propelled by healthy self-interest. "It is this type of political virtue," Lifshitz maintained, "that generates political power from the bottom up." The historical experience of the American Jewish community bears out the truth of this proposition with startling clarity.

But how can Jews (or anyone else) fail to be discomfited by the upheaval resulting from the global financial meltdown? Isn't this the ultimate indictment of the free market and proof par excellence that society needs more economic regulation?

Sam Peltzman, professor emeritus of economics at the University of Chicago, demurs. At the conference, he argued that, to the contrary, excessive efforts to regulate economic conduct actually induced behaviour leading to the financial crisis.

The human proclivity for risk-taking, Peltzman pointed out, can never be wholly suppressed by bureaucratic regulation. As American and European bankers and CEOs sought means of offsetting the intended effects of regulation, they set in motion a vicious cycle, with offsetting behaviour begetting more regulations, which begot more offsetting behaviour. After the crash, the damage was then compounded by the U.S. government's willingness to bail out the banks and big corporations, thus rewarding rather than punishing their appalling economic decisions.

Analyzing the causes of the latest recession is obviously a complex undertaking, not to mention a matter of fierce debate among economists and others. But Peltzman's underlying point is that economic life is far too multiform and intricate to be made subject to government planning, which is at least as likely to impede as to further the cause of social progress. If this view, like others aired at the conference, still seems iconoclastic, that is at least partly because of the hold exercised on the liberal mind, including the liberal Jewish mind, by the notion that capitalism itself is a nefarious ideology designed to benefit "the rich" at the expense of everyone else.

To this, one cannot do better than respond with the historian Paul Johnson that, unlike socialism, capitalism is the farthest thing from "an ideology dreamed up by an economic philosopher." It is, instead, a way of life, one that simply evolved "from the free and unco-ordinated transactions and unimpeded movements of countless unknown individuals" – and that has brought similarly countless benefits to humankind.

Victor Krulak, a U.S. Marine Corps legend

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Victor (Brute) Krulak was one of the most illustrious officers in the annals of the U.S. Marine Corps. In a legendary 34-year career, he served in World War II, the Korean War and the Vietnam War.

The recipient of the Navy Cross, second only to the Medal of Honor in importance and prestige, he was 43 when he was appointed the youngest general in Marine Corps history.

Krulak played an integral role in two major events that changed the nature of warfare. He helped develop a landing craft, the Higgins boat, that was used in the Normandy landings and in amphibious assaults in the Pacific theatre. And he was a key figure in the development of the helicopter as an instrument of war.

A three-star general, he commanded Marine forces in the Pacific during the war in Vietnam. He retired in 1968 and died in 2008 at the age of 95.

Krulak's admiring biographer, Robert Coram, claims in Brute: The Life of Victor Krulak, U.S. Marine (Little, Brown and Company) that he was "the most important officer in the history of the United States Marine Corps, a man of dazzling intellect and extraordinary vision" and a model of rectitude, discipline and duty.

And yet, he adds, Krulak was a fabulist who concocted tall tales about himself till the end of his days.

Krulak portrayed himself as an Episcopalian of Moravian origin. But in fact, he was a Jew whose Ukrainian Jewish father, Meyer, arrived in the United States in 1889.

Meyer, having changed his name to Morris a year after his arrival, listed his nationality as Russian and his native language as Yiddish in the 1910 U.S. census. But in the 1920 census, he no longer identified as a Russian Jew and claimed he was born in Pennsylvania.

Krulak, born in Denver, Colo. and raised in a thoroughly secular home, never attended synagogue or had a bar mitzvah. "In this way, Morris paved the way for his son later to minimize his Jewish background," Coram explains.

Morris told his son, "It is not who you were or where you were from, but it is what you do that is important. If you study and you succeed, it will not matter what you were."

On his admission form to the U.S. Naval Academy, Krulak listed himself as Jewish. But around this period, he began attending an Episcopalian church in Cheyenne, Colorado, and telling people that his family had deep ancestral roots in America.

Krulak claimed that his great-grandfather fought with the Confederate army in the U.S. Civil War and that his father was born in Denver. "Victor Krulak would tell his own version of his life until the day he died," writes Coram tartly.

Coram would have been on safe ground had he labelled Krulak as a self-hating Jew. Declining to venture into that terrain, he nonetheless acknowledges that Krulak was "a haunted and driven man possessed of a psyche filled with spiders and snakes."

To Coram, the U.S. Naval Academy, then infamous for its racism and antisemitism, was "a pivot point" in Krulak's life. As he puts it, "Being a military officer was a shortcut to the American dream. What better way for a Jew to show his allegiance to America than by ... fighting for his country?"

Nicknamed Brute for his no-nonsense style, Krulak entered the academy after initially flunking the entrance exams. In his third year, he married his fiance, Amy Chandler, an Episcopalian of fine breeding.

Krulak's parents did not attend the wedding. "The most likely reason ... is that Brute did not want his Jewish parents at this gathering of eminent Episcopalians," Coram observes.

Commissioned a second lieutenant after his graduation in 1934, Krulak rose in the ranks quickly. Following tours of duty in the United States and China, he was assigned to the main Marine Corps base in Quantico, Va.

There he played a central role in developing what Dwight Eisenhower – a rising U.S. general and future U.S. president – called the most important piece of tactical equipment in World War II, the Higgins boat, which transported soldiers and material from ship to shore.

Subsequently, Krulak distinguished himself in bloody fighting in the Japanese-held Solomon Islands. After the war, he taught helicopter tactics at the Amphibious Warfare School.

Helicopters were used by the U.S. armed forces for three purposes: reconnaissance, observation and medical evacuation. Since they were generally regarded as primitive and unreliable machines, they were seen as experimental curiosities more than anything else.

Krulak, who co-wrote the first textbook for Marine helicopter pilots and war planners, dissented from this dogma, arguing that helicopters could also be used for intelligence gathering and flank security. In time, helicopters revolutionized warfare.

During the 1960s, Krulak was the principal adviser on counter-insurgency warfare to Robert McNamara, the secretary of defence. Krulak was in charge of psychological warfare and covert activities against the enemy in Vietnam. He wielded enormous influence.

In 1963, he received his third star as a general, but his hopes of becoming the next commandant of the Marine Corps were dashed. His son, Charles, however, was appointed commandant in 1995.

Krulak's other son, Vic, was an Episcopalian pastor. When one of his Jewish relatives asked, "What is a Jewish boy doing in this place?" Vic was stunned, never having been told about his father's Jewish roots.

After his retirement, Krulak was president of Copley News Service and wrote a book about the Marine Corps, First to Fight.

He was certainly a man of great acumen and accomplishments, but sadly enough, he never overcame his pathological aversion to being Jewish.

CONGRATULATIONS TO ISRAEL ON ITS 63RD ANNIVERSARY

EYE ON ARTS

By BILL GLADSTONE

BOOK LAUNCH FOR THE LAST RAIN, A NEW NOVEL BY EDEET RAVEL, SET FOR JUNE 22

The Last Rain, a new novel by Israeli-born author Edeet Ravel of Guelph, Ont., tells of the birth of a kibbutz. Based on her own childhood experiences, Ravel's latest work is written in the voice of six-year-old Dori, the daughter of secular, left-leaning North American Jews. The publisher is Penguin Canada.

Determined to create a new utopia, the family settles in Eldar, a remote hill in northern Galilee near the Lebanese border, but the challenge proves far more complex than they could have imagined.

Ravel is the author of a previous trilogy about the Arab-Israeli conflict and was a winner of the Canadian Jewish Book Award and a finalist for the Giller Prize. Ravel's politics may disturb some readers, but her deeply-felt plots still tug at the heart.

Professor Derek Penslar of the University of Toronto is slated to interview Ravel at the launch, which is being sponsored by the New Israel Fund of Canada. Northern District Library, 40 Orchard View Blvd., Wednesday, June 22, 7 p.m.

Names in the News: Avner Mandelman, an Israeli-born Jew who lives in Toronto, has won the 2011 Arthur Ellis Award for Best First Crime Novel for his novel, The Debba.

Central to the plot is the mythical animal of the title, a protean Arab hyena that can turn itself into a man to "lure Jewish children away from their families to teach them the language of the beasts." The novel's protagonist, David Starkman, is a former Israeli military assassin living in Canada who returns to Israel after his father's gruesome murder; the terms of his father's will compel him to stage a controversial play called The Debba, written by his father.

"Disguised as a breathtaking thriller, Avner Mandelman's novel reveals Israel's double soul, its inherent paradoxes, and its taste for both art and violence," noted the Globe and Mail last December. The book contains what the Globe referred to as "unsavoury caricatures of Jews," and because it is critical of Israel, "may antagonize some readers and will undoubtedly spark controversy..." However, "the multilayered climax dazzles."

Mandelman has produced several previous short story collections, and is currently working on The Undertaker, a crime novel about the mysterious killings of Sephardi drug dealers in Tel Aviv against the backdrop of the looming 1982 Lebanon War.

Actor combines her two passions

Laura Fixman
Intern

Kelly Holiff always had two dreams in life – to help people and to act.

She had the chance to combine these two passions by playing Joanne in Fallen Rock Theatre Company's production of Rent.

Fallen Rock's mandate is to bring quality theatre to Toronto, provide emerging artists a place to showcase their talents and to give all the funds it raises to important causes.

The company has raised more than $350,000 in the past nine years. This year, the Pediatric Oncology Group of Toronto (POGO), a group that makes sure all Canadian children with cancer have equal access to treatment, is the company's cause, as it has been for the past six years.

Holiff said that she likes that the profits go to POGO because the group doesn't get as much attention as larger charities do. POGO focuses not only on the children with cancer, Holiff said, but also their families.

She said that she has gotten close to everyone at POGO, and also everyone she works with at Fallen Rock. "They're like my second family," Holiff said. "The people have grown, and the family has grown."

After a friend told Holiff about Fallen Rock, she decided to audition for Beauty and the Beast, its 2008 production. She didn't think she was right for any of the parts, but she ended up playing Mrs. Potts. She had a role in Fallen Rock's 2010 production of The Putnam County Spelling Bee, but she said the part of Joanne is the most exciting one she's had so far.

"I've always wanted to be in Rent," she said. "The opportunity presented itself and I jumped on it."

After Holiff graduated from the Randolph Academy for the Performing Arts, she worked in productions for several theatre companies, and while she enjoyed her involvement with them all, she said there's something different about Fallen Rock.

Kelly Holiff as Mrs. Potts in Beauty and the Beast.

"There's nothing like Fallen Rock," Holiff said. "It changes your life. It's just magical. If I can be involved every year, that's the goal."

Holiff said that it was amazing to get 15 people in a room singing Seasons of Love, a song from Rent, and she hopes that translates to an amazing experience for the audience.

Holiff said seeing the show won't only be enjoyable for people who are already fans of Rent, called "Rent-heads."

Fallen Rock was started by young lawyers, who Holiff said are passionate about theatre. She said that she respects them because they're helping her do what she's always wanted to do.

"I've always wanted to help people by doing what I'm best at, and that's what I get to do at Fallen Rock," Holiff said.

This summer, Holiff will be playing Tracy, the main character in Hairspray, at the Port Hope Festival, and she will be producing a benefit concert for the Heart and Stroke Foundation in September, in memory of her grandfather.

Fallen Rock's production of Rent will running at the Bathurst Street Theatre, 1736 Bathurst St. until June 18. For tickets call 416-978-8849 or www.uofttix.ca. For more information about Fallen Rock Theatre Company, go to www.fallenrock.ca.

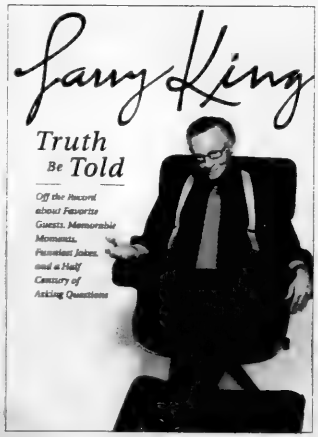
Larry King looks back at lengthy career

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Reading Larry King's Truth Be Told (Viking Canada) is a bit like having an old relative over for dinner. Expect to be entertained, informed and wondering where all this is leading.

Truth be Told is a nostalgic look back at the interviewer's remarkable 50-year broadcasting career, and his 25 years with Larry King Live, the longest-running show with the same host in television. He discusses the reasons behind his leaving his popular CNN show, as well as the marriage problems that were haunting him around the time of his departure.

But mostly he just sits back and does what he's good at. Subtitled Off the Record about Favorite Guests, Memorable Moments, Funniest Jokes and A Half Century of Asking Questions, the book is filled with candid stories about many of the illustrious, famous and infamous people that King chatted with over the years, frequently digressing into humorous anecdotes before getting back on point.



Larry King
Truth
Be Told
Off the Record about Favorite Guests, Memorable Moments, Funniest Jokes, and a Half Century of Asking Questions

He spends a few pages discussing the three interviews he's had with one of his more controversial guests, Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who he said was like interviewing a cagey lawyer.

King describes Ahmadinejad as a clever academic who "liked to answer my questions with questions." He says the Iranian leader sidestepped the tough questions and would "take a fact that was unrepresentative of the larger truth and make it a convenient point."

In the end, King says, it comes down to statements and actions. You can ignore him when he says there was no Holocaust and shake your head when he insists there are no gays in Iran. "But if he says that Israel should be eliminated, then it's irresponsible to turn away."

King talks about the Middle East and how he's gotten to know all Israeli leaders since David Ben-Gurion and how Benjamin Netanyahu told him not to move to Israel. "You'll get my job," the Israeli prime minister quipped.

King also gives us some straight talk on lighter topics such as music, movies, broadcasting and comedians. He also talks about his final show and his replacement, Piers Morgan.

Runners get heads up for 2012 Jerusalem Marathon

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It can take months to prepare for a marathon, so Ronen Krumholtz wants to give Canadian runners an early heads-up: the Jerusalem Marathon will be run on Friday March 16, 2012, and you're invited.

Krumholtz, the sales and marketing director for Diesenhaus-Unitours Incoming Tourism in Tel Aviv, said the 42-kilometre race is attracting more and more people from outside Israel, and organizers see North America, including Canada, as ripe source for new participants. Only about 25 Canadians took part in this year's event, a small part of the 250 North Americans who pounded the city's historic pavement. Altogether 10,000 runners took part in the event, which included full marathon distances, as well as a half marathon and a very popular 10-k race. Some 1,000 runners came from outside Israel and, to no one's surprise, the race was won by a Kenyan.

Americans, Italians, French and Germans were among the largest groups of visiting runners, Krumholtz said, and they are part of a growing segment of travellers who participate in long distance races around the world. Jerusalem marathon organizers as well as tourism promoters are hoping to get a piece of that action. Their selling point, according to Krumholtz, is Jerusalem's "breathtaking course, which includes the Old City."

Runners enter through the Jaffa Gate and jog through the Old City until they exit through the Zion Gate. The course itself can be difficult given the city's hilly topography, but runners enjoy a unique racing experience of running through one of the world's most historic cities. The race begins at the Knesset, Israel's parliament, and the course takes runners through neighbourhoods such as the German Colony, Talpiot, Katamon and the Old City, Krumholtz said.

Adding to the race's allure is the option of adding a touring component, he continued. When not racing, runners can enjoy visits to the Galilee, travel down to the Dead Sea for a spa experience that includes massages and mud baths, and add an excursion to Jordan if they choose.

Diesenhause-Unitours, which has been hired to promote the Marathon and serve as the official travel agent, is equipped to make all arrangements, he said.

Around 1,200 rooms have been allocated to marathon participants, mostly near the start line but some with views of the Old City walls.

Oded Grofman, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO), said Israel is becoming known to travellers for more than its historic and religious sites.

"There is a huge trend of people travelling around the world to participate in different marathons," he said.

Jerusalem mayor Nir Barkat, who has run five marathons in cities around the world, "is pushing the city as a normal city and trying to expand the number of tourists," Grofman said. "I think [the marathon] can be a great tradition for the city."

The IGTO is increasingly receiving calls from people interested in hiking and biking trips to the Holy Land and recently, representatives of groups planning a trip to Israel are inquiring about a sports component to their visit as well.

The Jerusalem Marathon will sponsor an information booth at the 2011 Scotiabank Waterfront Marathon Exhibition from Oct. 14 to 15. Grofman hopes to grow the number of Canadian runners at the Jerusalem Marathon to perhaps 50.

"We will build the market step by step," Grofman said.

HOISTING THE STANLEY CUP

by Shel Krakofsky

with gnarled, flattened noses they have sacrificed teeth and joints to parade the Cup clutching it aloft sideways passing it to one another with primal yelps lips crudely pressed where their names will be etched metal on metal
a celebration to themselves
these newest kings of the world in a more tranquil arena

a scroll is raised upright embraced and kissed with ecstatic serenity in love and submission not conquest and domination

the unfurled aleph bets more broad-shouldered muscular and bold than Esau or any athlete
the words scorched into parchment elevated for Jacob to proclaim
a different kind of sovereignty

Shel Krakofsky has twice received the Canadian Jewish Book Prize for Poetry.

OPERA BY THE OLD CITY WALLS

Jerusalem, the opera by Giuseppe Verdi, was performed last week for the first time alongside Jerusalem's Old City walls at the Sultan's Pool.

The opera, written by Verdi in 1847, tells a story that takes place in the Crusader period.

Ilanit Melchior, director of tourism for the Jerusalem Development Authority, said that "the municipality invested $1 million (US) in the project and will continue investing in such projects in Jerusalem, turning the city into a cultural tourist attraction. Thousands of music lovers attended the event."

Rabbi aims to bridge gaps in Jewish education

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

When Rabbi Lawrence Hajioff was growing up, he wanted to break the Jewish stereotype of becoming a lawyer or a doctor and instead opted to fulfil a different one by becoming a comedian.

Little did he realize that his love of laughter would lead him to become a rabbi. He is now the official rabbi for Birthright Israel in Manhattan, the Jewish educator at the Jewish Enrichment Center in New York and a teacher at Stern College, the women's division of Yeshiva University in New York.

Known as an inspiring and comedic teacher from Stern College, Rabbi Hajioff will be in Toronto on June 16 to deliver the keynote address at the Yeshiva University (YU) Torah MiTzion Beit Midrash fundraiser, honouring the beit midrash's second year in Toronto and its partnership with YU Canada.

Originally from London, England, Rabbi Hajioff grew up with a yeshiva education but called it "uninspiring." He did not take his Jewish studies too seriously and instead dreamed of becoming a comedian.

His role models were not his yeshivish rabbis but comedic acts including Mel Brooks, Monty Python and Jackie Mason. He ended up working for MTV in production, and ironically, it was there that he became reconnected to his Jewish roots.

"I grew up with a lot of rabbis who were nice, but I couldn't relate to them. When I started working for MTV, a few of my non-Jewish friends encouraged me to get involved in Jewish activities. After working in media for a few years, I realized I needed more from life," he said.

Rabbi Lawrence Hajioff

Rabbi Hajioff recalled the moment he realized he wanted to learn more about his Jewish faith.

"I was on a bus when a priest sat next to me, and he asked if I was Jewish and if he could ask me a question about the Ten Commandments. I was Jewish and I had received a Jewish education, but I couldn't even name all the Ten Commandments. So I answered him the best I could, but I realized I needed to know more about my own traditions since a priest knew more about my religion than I did," he said.

After this incident, he began taking classes and meeting new rabbis. He went back to yeshiva and began to love what he was studying, which prompted him to start studying for his smichah.

Nowadays, he is known as the "funny rabbi in New York who can relate to college students and young professionals."

One of his famous talks is called "Why Jews become comedians," which he will be delivering in Toronto on Thursday.

Rabbi Hajioff handing out a copy of "The Big Book of Jewish Humor" to Birthright Alumni participants.

He believes that comedy is deep-rooted in the Jewish people, attributing the first Jewish joke to have been told after the Jews were standing at the Red Sea and asked Moses, "Are there no graves in Egypt that we have to die here?"

"Inside the Jewish people is the ability to laugh because Jews had to deal with desperate situations and comedy was our way to deal with tough times," Rabbi Hajioff said.

He also works with Jewish alcoholics and addicts through an organization called JACS. He met all kinds of people, from Chassidim to completely secular Jews dealing with the same problems.

"It was the most incredible unity I had ever seen," he said.

He quickly learned that everyone has baggage.

"There is a disease in our generation of low self-esteem. This causes a lot of problems, and most of my job is now relationship counselling because people are waiting for the 'perfect' person they see on TV. I spend a lot of time dragging people to the chupah," he said, laughing.

After becoming ordained as a rabbi, he was selected to be the official rabbi of Birthright Manhattan. He works with Birthright alumni who "have been sparked" and want to learn more about their religion.

He travels to Israel three times a year with more than 80 students to provide students with a deeper, more meaningful experience of Israel and runs programs and classes at the Jewish Enrichment Center in New York.

One of his most successful programs is called the adult bar and bat mitzvah program for which he gives bar and bat mitzvahs to adults in their mid-20s who have never had one.

"I have people come to me who have been to Israel on Birthright, and they come back and ask 'what next?' My centre fills in that gap, maintaining the connection people felt on Birthright so it doesn't disappear. Birthright sparks, but we have to keep the flame alive."

His goal is to provide young professionals with a place to meet other Jews, learn about their traditions in a fun, inspiring setting.

"In colleges, there are usually Jewish organizations that keep students involved in Jewish life, but where do you go for your Jewish fix once college is over? We fill that void."

It is especially important for Rabbi Hajioff to fill in that gap, considering the majority of Jews do not get married in college and will meet their spouses when they are in their mid-20s.

Many people say the biggest challenge facing the Jewish community is intermarriage and assimilation but, according to Rabbi Hajioff, these are just symptoms of a larger problem.

"The real challenge is the lack of an inspiring Jewish education, making kids enjoy and want to be Jewish. The 'just say no' campaign for drugs failed because students want answers to their questions. It's the same way with Judaism. Negative advertising, like telling your kid not to inter-marry, won't work because they need a real authentic Jewish education," the rabbi said.

He added that being Jewish can be inspiring. Many young professionals who come to him say that they have never met a rabbi they feel connected to.

"The Jewish educational system has failed us to some degree, but it is changing and I am hopeful. Toronto is on the leading edge of this and has a lot of inspiring communities here," he said.

"There is a tremendous need for spirituality and authenticity in our generation. I help give people the tools to look at Judaism themselves, to empower them to take their Judaism and pass it along to others. If we make Jews passionate about Judaism when they had no passion to start with, that's a real sign of success."

How to get your man

"How can you find good guys?" my friend Alice asks me. She's smart, gorgeous, and still looking for Mr. Right.

So, for her and all my single readers (this time the women, next time the men), here are some tips.

If you're after a millionaire (and who can blame you?) and you're poor and no Einstein, you'll have to be 22 and a busty blonde, and he'll have to be 87 and a short baldie with a protruding paunch. You'll have to get used to adoring his glossy head (sure, he has a head on his shoulders. Literally. Where's the neck?).

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

When he buys you a diamond ring, say, "Oh, that's nice, but a single rose would symbolize our love just as much." But if buster hands you rose after rose, and not one diamond, throw him out immediately! Same goes with the stupid idea of a prenup – throw him out! (Who does he think you are, some gold digger?)

If you're after a famous star, first and foremost, don't "recognize" him. When you spot him, wrinkle your forehead and say, "Excuse me? Have we met before?"

His fragile ego won't stand the heat, and he'll start trying to impress you. ("How come she didn't know who I am? Me?")

When he confesses he's a movie star, say, "Sorry, not into the movies these days." Or, "You're a singer? Sorry, I'm a classical music fan." Or, "You're a comedian? Hate that genre, love tragic dramas."

He'll probably season his talks with some punch lines. Never laugh! Don't even smile. You're too sophisticated for that.

When you stroll together and run into some fans, say, "Can't understand those crazy people who admire someone just because he can memorize some silly written lines!" Or (after you watch one of his movies with him), "It's amazing how a good makeup artist hides those lines under your eyes. And the way they make you look taller amazes me." And for dessert: "Your director is a God. The way he managed to hide your belly in every scene!"

Still, a word of caution: don't overdo it. Remember, he can't survive without admiration, so throw him a bone from time to time.

If you're after a nature guy, shower him with tales of your commitment to save extinct species. Tell him how much you adore animals. Stop trying to kill his annoying, untrained puppy who's just given your new fake fur coat a No. 1 souvenir. Don't let him see you kill any animal (even a mosquito), and if he hands you a sack of organic rocks, be patient, at least until he hands you the rock you're waiting for.

And in general, for all men: be super motherly when he's got the flu. Listen to his complaints ("Honey, you've gotta see my tonsils. I can't swallow. I'll never be able to eat again! I've heard of people who pass away from this much pain!").

One final word: try to fall in love with your man. After all, love is all there is...

A beautiful summer!

I will be taking a writing hiatus until September. I am grateful to The CJN staff, particularly editor Mordechai Ben-Dat, for allowing me to write for the paper.

Writing is an onerous task, and coupled with my responsibilities as a father and as president at a growing Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, it feels right to rest at this point.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

As we head into the summer, a dreamy season when the colours of our city are as bright as the winter hues are subdued, I encourage everyone to choose a classic book to read on a topic you have always considered fascinating.

The summer is a marvellous time to open your mind and learn new ideas and concepts. Study Judaism, learn Torah. Encourage yourself to finally understand physics. Read great novels and become the mystery writer you've always wanted to be.

Over the summer, consider your ability to do tikkun olam. Be introspective. Pinpoint your personal gift and bring it to the surface, then apply it to your chesed work.

If you are a poet, then offer your words, phrases and teaching to Covenant House. An organization that helps homeless youth, it has an in-house high school. Hook up with some street rappers who write poetry and figure out ways to get their voices heard, their poetry published.

Befriend your gift, your matanah – your present, and if you determine that your listening skills are above standard, phone around to see if an institution exists that would allow you to listen to seniors, or immigrants, talk about their feelings, their dreams.

This summer, find groups of children who stay in the city and just hang around. Once you do, start a reading club, or sports group, and give these kids a sense of hope.

Within every child, teen or adult is that gift, that spirit that they were born with and must disseminate far and wide. Now far and wide may be your neighbourhood. It might even be your home, but it should not only stay with just you.

My father, of blessed memory, used to say, "The gates of heaven are not closed during the summer months." He is right. The atrocities in the Congo will continue throughout the next 12 weeks, and many children in Israel will be hungry by noon, with little nutritional respite until supper. Walk through those gates and invite yourself into the hearts and homes of our brothers and sisters everywhere, offer your expertise to help them get through a rough situation.

Thank you for your letters and e-mails this year and to all of you bloggers who picked up my articles and disseminated my messages to others.

Have a hugely rich summer. Start your book and dedicate it to someone who shared their gift with you. Learn how to dance. Teach your child about empathy, as it is a learned behaviour and response.

Peace should come to Israel this summer, and as I tell my son every night, 'God should watch over you, your mommy and daddy, all good people, all the kids on our planet, the animals, and bring shalom, peace to our world.

B'shalom, Avrum

PS: Ve'ahavta has just had an open house and therefore I am feeling inspired. Our new digs are stunningly beautiful and esthetically represent that we are the Tikun Olam International Centre. At the open house, we were honoured to have dozens of volunteers, donors and client present, as well as MP Irwin Cotler and Israel's consul general, Amir Gissin. You're invited to drop by. Blessing. Devotion. Sanctuary

Editorial

In the pages of this supplement, we take special delight in publishing an eclectic array of articles of tribute to Israel.

These days, except in publications such as The CJN or by men and women of honest mind, historic literacy and fearless temperament, tributes to Israel are quite rare.

Some of the very loud and very aggressive supporters of an independent Palestinian state have nastily elbowed out of the public discourse any complimentary or admiring statements about Israel, as if Israeli achievement and Palestinian statehood were mutually exclusive. Of course, for the individuals with the most malevolence in their hearts toward the Jewish state, they are. But that is objectively absurd, and indeed a large part of the reason that Palestinian sovereign independence remains, after all these years, still unrealized.

The more civil circles of anti-Israel advocates dare not call for the elimination of the only Jewish state on earth. That would be too abrupt and probably very messy. Rather, to assuage their very selective consciences, they cry out BDS: Boycott. Divestment. Sanctions.

Let all decent people rally to the cause of BDS, they shout. For only that is the respectable, non-violent way to make room for an independent Palestinian state. Punish, wallop, reduce, vilify, defame, strangle, demonize, delegitimize the Jewish state. That is entirely all right with them.

We, however, oppose them, with all our heart and with all our might.

Yet, we need not oppose the actual use of the letters "BDS." In fact, we should appropriate them for a more accurate, more honourable, more trustworthy telling about the Jewish state.

We therefore introduce a new BDS: Blessing. Devotion. Sanctuary.

And that is what the articles in the pages of this tribute to Israel are intended, in part, to convey.

Blessing. Virtually every field of human endeavour and every aspect of the human condition has benefited from the advances wrought by Israeli scientists, scholars, engineers, mathematicians, physicians, musicians, artists, philanthropists and social entrepreneurs. Countless are the Israeli inventions that have been seamlessly incorporated into our everyday lives. The bounty of Israel's blessings to humankind flows without interruption.

See, for example, the stories about the caring and compassion of the Israeli paramedics or the upcoming Third Presidential Conference: Facing Tomorrow, at which thousands of experts from around the world will gather in Israel to try to design a better future for the world.

Devotion. Only under Israeli rule have the holy sites of the three monotheistic religions and other recognized devotions been protected by law. Only under Israeli rule have worshippers from around the world been allowed to practice their devotions in respect and reverence. The followers of the Baha'i faith can eloquently attest to this devotional truth. We urge readers to read the essay in the supplement regarding Jerusalem's Jewish heritage.

Sanctuary. When Jews have sought rescue from oppression, Israel has been their sanctuary. Last month, we commemorated the 20th anniversary of Operation Solomon, the rescue of some 14,000 Jews from Ethiopia to freedom and haven in Israel.

Next month, on July 4, we recall the 35th anniversary of the raid on Entebbe. A former president of Israel, Haim Herzog, once wrote of that exceptional moment: "Apart from this message [regarding the cause of human freedom], the IDF action at Entebbe delivered a special message to the Jewish people, telling them clearly and dramatically that, as in the time of the Maccabees, they are not alone... Jews may sometimes find themselves living in fear, but never again do they have to live without hope." See the photo montage about the Entebbe rescue in the supplement.

BDS.

Blessing. Devotion. Sanctuary. We can and should take back these letters from the propagators of falsehood and hatred against Israel. Then, cheering, like the youngsters in the photo above celebrating Yom Yerushalayim recently in Israel, we would promote real tribute to Israel.

The swearing-in of Jay

Sarah Shapiro Goldberg
Special to The CJN

In May 2010, my son Jay led a Birthright trip to Israel. Having just graduated from the University of Waterloo, he wanted to visit the Jewish state.

After I came back to life with my first cup of coffee on the early morning of his return, he looked at me with an awkward smile. Knowing my son, I wasn't surprised when he said he was going to volunteer in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) through a program called Machal, for non-Israelis who want to serve.

It was a natural extension for Jay to want to participate in something extraordinary, his only motive a love for Israel and an idealistic spirit. Our family understood this, accepted it and fully supported his decision.

His plan began to take shape, and suddenly it was the end of July, and off he went. In the oppressive August heat, Jay began his journey toward becoming a soldier. This is the story of Jay's final swearing-in ceremony and all of the drama that ensued.

Jay's official recruitment would begin in November, but he was required to be in Israel two months earlier. He enrolled in a pre-basic training program with Aish Hatorah called Aish Machal. This program combines pre-basic training with study and it allows for taking care of the overwhelming paperwork typical of things Israeli: applications, documents, appointments and more applications. This program provided a real sense of what was to come and the opportunity to ask himself if he was up to the challenge.

No problem.

On Nov. 1, he boarded a bus bound for a base near Eilat where he was issued his Zahal (military) uniform, which he wore with respect and pride.

For the next four months, Jay was immersed in the language and culture of army training. He was placed in a unit where they would make use of his engineering skills. Jay always wanted to be a civil engineer, but more specifically the guy who demolishes stuff – whatever makes noise and requires goggles. His facility for Hebrew made the transition easier. He became known as "the Canadian who didn't have to be here."

In December, my family in Israel, the Ilanis, attended the inaugural swearing-in ceremony marking the end of the first phase of Jay's training. They documented the event with pictures of Jay receiving his gun and Tanach. These are strange companions intended to represent the strength and humanity of a Jewish army. The breathtaking images captured the essence of the occasion with all the symbols of military pomp and circumstance.

Jay Goldberg

We knew basic training ended in March. When speaking to Jay, I asked from time to time when the final swearing-in ceremony would be.

In planning a visit to Israel, I hoped and preferred that the date would be sometime in July, since the spring would interfere with my work. However, when I lost my job in January, spring started looking much better. I knew right then I would show up at the final swearing-in ceremony and surprise my son.

I imagined myself like Forest Gump running across the reflecting pool to his Jenny, the whole world watching and cheering. But it would be me jumping over the stands, pushing through everyone, running to my son, the greatest surprise for him ever. And through the magic of YouTube, the scene of our reunion of course would be flashed across the universe.

But I quickly snapped out of my delusion, for I had three things to do before booking my flight and three days in which to do them.

First I had to ask my cousin Aviva if I could stay with her in Israel.

"We would love to have you, and by the way, here's a list of things to bring."

Next and most importantly, I contacted the employment insurance office to find out how my insurance benefits would be affected.

"Are you sure I won't lose my benefits altogether?" I asked a live clerk. "Are you positive?" I asked again.

'Just let us know the date you get back and enjoy being with your son," she answered.

The third item was to confirm the date of the ceremony. Jay had told me the ceremony would commence on March 10 with the conclusion of the traditional new recruits' 40-kilometre hike.

Grandfather's dream

But I knew that Jay could not be trusted with dates. He could easily tell me later that he hadn't meant March, but rather, June.

Through the Lone Soldier's office of the IDF I was indeed able to confirm March 10 as the date. Everyone in the IDF except Jay knew a Lone Soldier's mother was coming from Canada to attend the swearing-in ceremony. I booked the flight. I would be in Israel for four days.

Like an impatient child, I counted the number of sleeps I had remaining before it was time to leave. I could hardly breathe for the excitement and anticipation I felt.

The Monday before my departure date, I was stuck in Toronto's afternoon gridlock but so happy in my thoughts, and my daughter Robin called.

"Are you driving?"

"Kind of, what is it?"

"There's an issue. Pull over."

Shaking, I couldn't believe what I was now hearing.

My cousin Aviva had called to say that Israel was forecasting terrible rainstorms, flooding and winds. The ceremony had to be cancelled. Missing from this plague were only the locusts!

My heart sank like a stone.

The perfect example of the well-known reminder to "plan all you want, but God can laugh in your face." In Yiddish it rhymes, so poignant in its harsh truth. (Mahn tracht; Gott lacht.)

Although the formal ceremony was cancelled, the unit would still be doing a 40-K hike near the base, finishing in the middle of the night with a makeshift ceremony but family was not permitted to attend. I could do nothing from my side of the ocean to change things. It was left to my cousins to figure out how to rescue the situation. In true Israeli style, my cousin's husband, Rafi, began making phone calls to see what he could arrange quickly.

The morning of my flight, I decided to tell Jay I was coming. I could only leave him a message. But I was not sure if he would pick it up. With tears streaming down my cheeks I told him about my perfect plan and how God had laughed in my face.

The miserable forecast was accurate. When I arrived in Israel, it was pouring throughout the country, except in the south. Without Jay knowing and despite contrary IDF regulations, Rafi arranged for Jay's discharge early Thursday morning. All Jay was told was to be ready at 8 a.m. to catch a bus to Beer Sheva.

We left at 4 a.m. in torrential rain and headed south toward the Negev. I was jumping out of my skin but the steamy café hafuch (capuccino) calmed me down. The rain stopped and as the sky gradually brightened, the sun rose on a stunning desert morning. The golden sand against the electric blue sky announced the new day.

While in the car, I reflected on my marathon of crossing the ocean and travelling through the desert to celebrate a singular moment of such awesome personal significance.

At the gate, the guards asked who we were and what we were doing there. Heart pounding and legs trembling, I waited for my son to emerge. Within a few minutes Jay walked towards me escorted by his commander. I bolted through the gate like an Olympian and there experienced the most exquisite reunion of mother and son.

Jay looked healthy, strong and happy.

At the ceremony the night before, Jay was awarded the distinction of Chayal Mitztayen (outstanding soldier) given to a new soldier who distinguished himself as the most excellent.

In receiving the award, Jay was also paying tribute to his beloved late grandfather, Phil Goldberg. In May of 1948, after serving in Europe, Jay's zaide hastily departed for Israel to fight for the newborn state in the War of Independence. But he got only as far as Halifax, where he had to turn around to be at the bedside of his own father who had fallen ill. More than 60 years later, Jay actually fulfilled his grandfather's dream of defending Israel and the Jewish people.

Feeling of joy to last forever

Jay completed his basic training as a combat engineer. There was no fanfare, only the exhilaration and pride that accompany the sense of accomplishment.

Jay's sergeant gave him his beret with the hand-written inscription, in Hebrew: "My father flogged you with whips, but I will flog you with scorpions." I Kings 12:14:

The inscription is meant to convey the thought that "you are the one I chose to push harder and test further. Because I believe in you, I will make it more difficult and you will become a better soldier."

With steely determination, Jay always pushed harder.

In Jerusalem, we took in the glorious chaos of the shuk (market) on Friday afternoon. On Shabbat, we strolled the beautiful streets of Rechavia. After Shabbat, alas, it was time to say goodbye.

Although I travelled alone, I felt my other children symbolically beside me, sharing this milestone with their brother. I experienced every emotion over those four days, but it was the feeling of joy that I took back with me to last forever in my memory.

I pray that my son continues his service in good health.

I pray that God will watch over all of our sons and daughters who serve the State of Israel and will keep them safe from harm, steadfast in the hope that peace will come some day soon.

I dedicate this story to my cousin, Aviva Rubinstein Ilani, her husband, Rafi, and their children, Sh'ked, Nitzan, Raviv and Ayla, who made my reunion possible and perfect.

Boycotting Israel is a mistake, Coen Brothers say

Amit Kling
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

While on a visit to Israel to collect a $1-million award from Tel Aviv University, American filmmakers Joel and Ethan Coen said that they did not believe that boycotting Israel would solve political problems.

The production-direction team responsible for a string of successful Hollywood dramas in the last two decades, from The Big Lebowski to Miller's Crossing, came to the country recently to receive the

Ethan and Joel Coen

Dan David Prize for their creative contribution to filmmaking.

The Dan David Prize committee called the duo a unique example in cinematic history for their abilities to tell a simple story in a complex manner.

Named for businessman and philanthropist Dan David, the prize is administered by a board of directors headed by Tel Aviv University president Yoseph Klafter. Ten per cent of the recipients' prize money is donated on their behalf to doctorate and post-doctorate student grants.

Responding to a question about musicians and filmmakers who boycott the State of Israel because of its policies and actions, screenwriter and director Ethan Coen said, "People respond to real problems from the heart, and they think that's the right thing to do. We don't agree with that opinion, that that's how to deal with these problems."

The brothers' Jewish heritage is on display in a number of their films, most obviously in A Serious Man – translated into Hebrew as The Good Jew. Despite many references to Jewish cultural themes in their movies, the two deny that their own Jewishness is necessarily connected to their filmmaking.

"There were Jewish characters, but in regards to whether our background influences our filmmaking... who knows?" says Joel. "We don't think about it... There's no doubt that our Jewish heritage affects how we see things."

"We grew up in a Jewish community, but we never thought to make a story that deals with Israel," Joel continued. "We don't really know Israel – we write American stories. That's what we know."

"We've wanted to come here for a long time, but life got in the way," Joel said. "We're very happy for this opportunity. We'll spend a few days at Tel Aviv University."

The Coen Brothers were nominated for 12 Academy Awards in the last year alone for their most recent movie, True Grit. The film follows a decade of successes that include No Country for Old Men, A Serious Man, and O Brother, Where Art Thou?

The other prize winners for 2011 were University of California at San Francisco professor Cynthia Kenyon and Harvard medical school professor Gary Ruvkun for their work in gerontology and Stanford University medical school professor Marcus Feldman for his work in the evolutionary sciences.

Abigail Klein Leichman

For Tel Aviv-Jaffa residents and workers sick of skyrocketing gasoline prices and incessant traffic jams, the introduction of a new pilot bike-rental project this month couldn't have come at a better time.

Like some 200 other cities across the globe, Israel's commercial and cultural centre was looking for ways to encourage fitness and discourage fossil-fuel consumption. The launch of Tel-Ofan (ofanayim is Hebrew for bicycle) synchs with the municipality's multimillion-shekel investment in additional bike lanes to serve about 400,000 residents and many thousands more who commute in for work.

Tel Aviv-Jaffa Economic Development Authority CEO Sharon Kenan said that Tel-Ofan began with 40 stations and 450 subscribers, expanding daily to reach an eventual goal of 150 stations with up to 20 German-made bicycles each.

Using an electronic key fob, the subscriber picks up a bike and then parks it at the destination station. There's no charge for the first half hour, and if the bike is docked for at least 10 minutes, the user's "clock" restarts from zero.

"The purpose is that we want people to share the bikes," said Kenan, who heads the project on behalf of Mayor Ron Huldai. "While you're doing whatever you're doing, someone else will ride the bike you docked."

Kenan's staff worked on Tel-Ofan for three years before rolling it out. One of the trickiest operational details was how to make sure that when somebody comes to a station there will always be a bike available in good condition, and that the station of destination will always have a free docking place. That problem was tackled with the assistance of mathematicians at Tel Aviv University, who established formulas after researching typical bike-riding patterns in the city. Based on those formulas, trucks will patrol the rental stations on a regular basis, balancing supply and demand.

Another major challenge, according to Kenan, was to ensure a completely stable information technology system managing the project under the hood. And to deal with possible theft, damage and vandalism of the bike fleet, the EDA put both physical and electronic safeguards into action.

Now that all the pieces are in place, the next step is to physically accommodate the expected increase in bicyclists. To answer this need, the municipality is investing many millions of shekels to add to its existing 65 miles of bike lanes.

"In the last five years, we've invested 10 million shekels per year in constructing bike lanes, and for the next five years the municipality has tripled the budget for this project," said Kenan.

"Strategically, the ultimate goal is to increase awareness of bikes as a means of transportation and increase the number of people using them, which will substantially reduce traffic problems and air pollution."

Sign-up can be done on Tel-Ofan's website; via a toll-free phone number (*6070); or in person at City Hall.

Audacious Israelis race to the moon

Karin Kloosterman
Israel21c

Their robot will be about the size of a soda bottle, and it's expected to combine the best of Israeli technology from billion-dollar companies with cutting-edge research in academia. Their mission, if completed, could put Israel on the map as the third country to soft-land on the moon.

Working under the name Team SPACE IL, the founders of this non-profit Israeli lunar project include the team's CEO Yariv Bash, a computer and electronics engineer; chief operating officer Kfir Damari, a communications engineer; and chief techology officer Yonatan Weintraub, a master's student and graduate of NASA's International Space University.

The Israeli team is enrolled in the Google Lunar X Prize (www.googlelunarxprize.org), a global contest to reinvigorate space research by having the first privately funded team send a robot to the moon. However, the mission is also a social one: the men have pledged to donate all potential prize winnings – $30 million (US) – to Israeli students as a way of encouraging them to study science.

The logo of SPACE IL, the team entered in the Google Lunar X contest.

Competing against 28 other teams from countries around the world including the United States, Canada and Chile, SPACE IL plans to land its lunar robot by the end of 2012. The robot will be expected to complete a 500-metre moonwalk and take various high-quality images and videos to be beamed back to Planet Earth.

The team is planning for its micro-robot, about the size of a pop bottle, to hitch a ride on a commercial satellite launch – and for that it is calling on Israeli business and academia – to help propel the vision of putting the blue and white Israeli flag on the moon.

"The goal here is that we have a good opportunity to create a chance for Israel to get to the moon so we can put the Israeli flag there," Weintraub said. "We see the benefit for Israel's image in the world. And the education [aspect] is important here, too. When [former U.S. president John F.] Kennedy made his speech about the moon landing, he ignited the imagination of an entire generation. We want to do the same, to get kids to pursue careers in technology and science," he told Israel21c.

Weintraub first got fascinated with space studies where he was a preschooler. "I was looking for something very interesting to do and am lucky to be involved in a field where there are great opportunities to follow my passion."

Now finishing his master's degree in systems engineering through the space division at Israel Aerospace Industries, Weintraub studies the way engineers should be thinking about satellites as a holistic system, and not as parts, "making it work in a synchronized fashion."

This is what Weintraub was doing when he learned of the international race to the moon. Israeli-style, he and his two partners joined together at the last minute and scraped together the $50,000 entry fee. Industry experts in communication technology such as Elbit, and academics from the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology and Tel Aviv University are supporting the SPACE IL crew in its quest to raise the estimated $10 million needed to put the robot on the moon.

Like the race to fly a plane across the Atlantic Ocean in the last century, the Lunar X Prize founders hope to attract some of the world's greatest minds to change the face of space research, which, until now, has relied on costly government-funded initiatives. Only the United States and Russia have succeeded in landing on the moon, and the United States abandoned this project because of the restrictive costs. No more than 10 per cent of any Lunar X entrant's research money can come from government funds.

The moon is a first step – research developed through the Lunar X contest is expected to advance the space industry in general.

Space research has the potential to help humanity understand more about the process of climate change, and to develop inventions that could be directly applied to medical devices like better imaging technologies, diagnostics and even remote surgery, Weintraub said.

"When you build designs for space, you are pushing the limits of what technology can do, because the devices need to work by themselves."

Developing for extreme environments like the moon lends itself to technology transfer in many areas, some yet unimagined. Just minimizing the size of everything pushes industries forward, he said.

"The first PC came to us as a result of the American space program, for the most part, and history has shown that these kinds of projects built by really talented people can create some high-end technologies that can be used on Earth afterwards," he added.

"When we land, it will be by far the smallest spacecraft to land on the moon, and it could show how missions to space can be done on an order of magnitude less than what NASA now spends. We want to break the glass ceiling, proving that we can do a lot for science with a lot less."

In helping Palestinians, IDF paramedics defy stereotypes

Linda Gradstein
JTA

Yana Kisluk tossed her long ponytail over one shoulder and adjusted her M-16 over the other.

The pretty 21-year-old, who wears diamond stud earrings and eye makeup, looks like any other young Israeli doing her compulsory military service.

As a paramedic in the Israel Defence Forces, however, Kisluk belongs to a small group of Israeli soldiers whose job is to provide care for Palestinians, rather than simply defend against them.

On a recent morning, Kisluk's team of two paramedics and a driver got a call about a newly arrested Palestinian prisoner who said he is diabetic and needs a check of his glucose level. Kisluk and her colleague, Hagai Hayat, got into the ambulance and set off to the nearby military jail.

The prisoner, Adnan Abu Tabeineh, a lecturer in history at the Open University in Hebron, was brought in, his legs shackled.

"I feel very dizzy," he told the paramedics in broken Hebrew.

"Did you take your medicine today?" Kisluk asked.

"No," Tabeineh answered. "I have one medicine with me that the soldiers took away and another that I left at home."

Kisluk pricked his finger and measures his sugar level. It was 310, well above normal.

"He needs to take his medicine now," she told the Israeli soldiers at the jail. "You need to make sure he gets his other medicine from home."

"Just take your pill and you'll be fine," she reassured Tabeineh.

There was no talk about why he was detained, and the soldiers declined to answer a reporter's questions.

Twenty minutes later, Kisluk and Hagai were back in the ambulance, heading for their base and lunch.

Kisluk, who immigrated with her family to Israel as an infant, said she keeps her political opinions and her army service separate.

"Sometimes we don't even know if someone is Arab or Jewish," she said. "We just treat whoever needs it the most."

Hayat, a gentle soldier with dark hair and dark eyes, remembers a recent drive-by shooting attack in the West Bank that left four Israelis dead.

"As soon as we got the call, we started speeding there, putting on flak jackets and helmets," he said. "We were the second team to arrive and the casualties were lying on the ground. I went over to each of them, but they had no pulse. I did an EKG and saw that it was impossible to revive them. It was so difficult. I have all of this training and I couldn't do anything."

The paramedics spend 14 months in an intensive course and then must agree to serve for at least two more years in the army. For Kisluk, that means serving one year longer than most women. But she sees it as good preparation for a future career in medicine.

"Sometimes I laugh when I think that people my age in the U.S. are almost done with college and I haven't even started," she says. "But that's just the way it is in Israel. I do feel that I'm doing something meaningful here."

The paramedics, whose primary purpose is to care for Israeli soldiers, co-operate with local Israeli and Palestinian rescue services. For security reasons, they are not allowed to enter Arab towns or villages. Medical services are provided there by the Red Crescent, which is affiliated with the Red Cross.

In the parts of the West Bank that are either under sole Israeli control or joint Israeli-Palestinian control, the paramedics will not enter Arab villages, but often treat victims of car accidents on the main roads. Palestinians will even bring family members who need urgent medical attention to the gates of army bases, and the paramedics will come out to treat them.

Betty Ben Zaken, 21, who is responsible for the 11 paramedics in the West Bank, said they treated 115 Palestinians in 2010.

She said the Israeli soldiers take precautions to ensure that potential patients are not terrorists.

"We wear helmets and flak jackets to protect ourselves," Ben Zaken said. "But we also took an oath to treat anyone who needs it, and that comes first."

Last month, an Israeli paramedic helped a Palestinian woman give birth at an Israeli checkpoint. Human rights groups have charged that Palestinian women often are delayed at checkpoints and forced to give birth there. Israeli officials say they do everything possible to speed their passage through, but ambulances, which in the past have been used to smuggle weapons, must be checked. Ben Zaken says they help with at least one Palestinian birth per month.

Earlier this month, she said, family members brought an elderly man having a heart attack to the army base and the paramedics were able to save his life.

"I think it helps to show Palestinians that some Israeli soldiers just want to help," she said. "I hope that it influences how they think of us."

Time to assert Jerusalem's Jewish heritage

Nathan Diament
JTA

Among his many statements related to Israel recently, President Barack Obama got at least one thing right when he said at a London news conference that Jerusalem goes deep into how the Jewish people think about their identity.

As we marked 44 years of a reunited Jerusalem on June 1, we should appreciate the centrality of Jerusalem to Jewish identity.

This is why most Israelis and American Jews consistently reject the idea that Israel surrender swaths of the holy city as part of a peace deal with the Palestinians.

Jerusalem has been a touchstone of our identity throughout our history, and our contemporary experience gives Jerusalem a central place in our faith today.

From the religious perspective, when Jews pray, we face toward Jerusalem – and the Temple Mount in particular – no matter where we are in the world. We pray each day for the welfare of Jerusalem, and we conclude our most sacred services, the Passover seder and Neilah on Yom Kippur, with the pledge and prayer, "Next year in Jerusalem."

Historically, we regularly read biblical accounts of our forefathers and mothers that take place in and around Jerusalem. King David made the city his capital 3,000 years ago, and it has been the national capital of the Jewish people – and no other nation – ever since.

Only brute force has kept us out. Such was the case, we must still recall, from 1948 to 1967, when Jews were barred entry to the Old City and denied worship at the Western Wall during the time that the West Bank was controlled by Jordan.

Since Jerusalem's reunification in 1967, the city has been open to all. As noted by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in his recent address to the U.S. Congress, "Only a democratic Israel has protected freedom of worship for all faiths."

Moreover, reunification has enabled Jerusalem to flourish economically and culturally. While it is a poorer city than Tel Aviv, Jerusalem has a vibrant tourist trade, entrepreneurial businesses and first-rate theatre and museums.

Some, in Israel and elsewhere, assert that Jerusalem can be easily divided with minimal impact upon the life of the city, let alone the sanctity and safety of its holy places. Indeed, there are neighbourhoods, especially those to the east of the West Bank security barrier, where Jews seldom venture.

But modern Jerusalem is far more an interwoven checkerboard of Jewish and Palestinian areas than starkly segregated enclaves. The Arab area of Beit Safafa lies between the Jewish neighbourhoods of Talpiot and Gilo, while the Arab neighbourhood of Sheikh Jarrah lies between the Old City and the Jewish neighbourhood of French Hill. Moreover, an area like the City of David or Silwan may have more Palestinian than Jewish residents, but it is deeply connected to Jewish history.

It is no more feasible to separate the Palestinian and Jewish neighbourhoods of Jerusalem from one another than to ethnically divide the neighbourhoods of Manhattan.

Proponents of a "two-state solution" are wont to say that "everyone knows" what the details of a deal are. Those details often include the presumption that Jerusalem will again be divided and will serve as the capital of two states: Israel and Palestine.

It is high time to repudiate this presumption. The international community would never expect the Muslims to cede sovereignty over Mecca, the cradle of their faith and history, any more than Americans would be asked to return Philadelphia to the Queen of Britain. The Jewish people should be afforded no less respect. Jerusalem must remain united under Jewish sovereignty.

Days after the 1967 Six Day War and the reunification of Jerusalem, one of the great leaders of religious Zionism, Rabbi Moshe Tzvi Neriah, wrote that the Jews were not worthy to hold on to Jerusalem in 1948 because they were divided into many factions.

"In 1967," he wrote, "we entered the city through one gate, the Lions' Gate, with one army, the IDF, under one flag."

Of course, we Jews find ourselves in many factions today. We must fight on many fronts to assert the Jewish heritage of Jerusalem. We must commit ourselves to confronting those who would redivide our capital from without and to working to unify the Jewish people from within.

We must do it for the sake of Jerusalem.

Nathan Diament is the director of public policy at the Orthodox Union.

A Jew prays at the cemetery on the Mount of Olives in eastern Jerusalem. Due to its proximity to the Temple Mount, the cemetery was always considered a place of special privilege for Jews to be buried there. After Israel's War of Independence, many of the gravestones were vandalized or uprooted. [Israel Sun photo]

We must talk about the two Jerusalems

Rabbi Jill Jacobs
JTA

After my first visit to Israel, at age six, I proudly toted my photo album to Hebrew school for show-and-tell. As the class crowded around a picture of the Kotel, my teacher marvelled, "Look how blue the sky is!"

I squinted at the picture: the sky didn't look any bluer than the sky in Framingham, Mass., where I grew up. But I believed her. Of course, the Jerusalem sky would be bluer than anywhere else in the world.

I'm still not sure about that sky, but my teacher's comment sums up the relationship that many American Jews have with Jerusalem. For many of us, Jerusalem has become more of a spiritual ideal than an actual place.

On June 1, many Jews celebrated Yom Yerushalayim, or Jerusalem Day, which marks the 1967 military victory that led to Israeli control of East Jerusalem.

In the American Jewish communities that celebrate Yom Yerushalayim, the day often becomes a time for rhetoric about the perfection of Jerusalem. We may quote the ancient rabbinic claim that nine-tenths of the world's beauty rests in Jerusalem. We speak of Jerusalem as the city of peace and as the holy city. We sing Naomi Shemer's song Jerusalem of Gold of Bronze, of Light.

Some of this talk reflects a conscious political attempt to close down any discussion about the status of Jerusalem in a peace agreement. Some of this talk arises from a well-intentioned desire to put aside politics and focus on Jerusalem's religious meaning.

But nothing about Jerusalem is apolitical.

If we focus only on the holiness and beauty of the place, we unfeelingly ignore the pain of its Arab residents, low-income families, foreign workers and others whose lives there involve injustice and lost opportunity. If we focus only on the injustices committed there, we forget the religious power of Jerusalem for Jews, Muslims and Christians.

When we choose to speak about Jerusalem only in idealistic terms, we fail to grapple with the essential messiness of the actual place. In the real Jerusalem, people go to work, run errands and worry about their children. In the real Jerusalem, haredi Orthodox and secular Israelis battle over Shabbat laws and segregated bus lines. In the real Jerusalem, English speakers and well-off Israelis eat sushi in upscale cafés.

In the real Jerusalem, longtime Arab residents are evicted from the homes they have occupied for decades so that religious Jewish settlers can move to homes they have purchased in the neighbourhood. In the real Jerusalem, inspiring activists and advocates devote their life to creating a better city for all residents. In the real Jerusalem, Jews, Muslims and Christians come to pray.

The disconnect between the idea of Jerusalem and the reality of the place is not a new phenomenon.

Classical Jewish texts distinguish between "Yerushalayim shel malah," the spiritual, heavenly Jerusalem, and "Yerushalayim shel mata," the earthly Jerusalem. In Yerushalayim shel malah, God is visible, suffering is absent and there is perfection. In Yerushalayim shel mata, real people struggle with deep political, religious and personal conflict. In Yerushalayim shel mata, perfection remains elusive.

When we speak only about the beauty and holiness of Jerusalem, we effectively act as though we already live in Yerushalayim shel malah. This approach gets in the way of our making progress in ensuring that the actual Jerusalem is a just and peaceful place.

If we are able instead to engage with Yerushalayim shel matah, in all of its messiness and complexity, we have a chance to create a better future for the city. Encountering this messiness means visiting, or at least reading about, the diverse communities living in the city. It means seeing what neighbourhoods make up east Jerusalem, who lives there, and how life differs in the Arab and Jewish parts of the city. It means spending time in religious and secular communities and understanding the tensions as well as the commonalities between them. It means visiting the wealthiest and poorest neighbourhoods of the city.

Jerusalem has become the primary battleground for the peace process and for internal debates about the nature of Israeli society. Jerusalem's status in these debates is both symbolic and real.

The rabbis of the Talmud describe Jerusalem as the portal to heaven. There is, according to these texts, a direct line from Jerusalem to the Divine throne. However, these same rabbis elsewhere assert that one of the doors to "gehenom," the underworld, also sits in Jerusalem. Jerusalem, the holiest of all cities, offers the possibility of Divine encounter. But even the ancient rabbis understood the flip side of this holiness: we can get so involved in our own religious longings that we fail to see that we are falling into unhappy territory.

Next year, let's make Yom Yerushalayim a time for real communal conversation about the messy, complicated and exciting history, reality and future of the city. If we succeed in doing so, we may move ourselves just one step closer to realizing Yerushalayim shel malah.

World experts gather at Israeli presidential conference

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21c

Israeli President Shimon Peres

Nearly 200 of the world's most recognized names in fields from diplomacy to medicine will share their ideas at the Third Israeli Presidential Conference: Facing Tomorrow 2011, June 21 to 23, at the International Convention Center in Jerusalem.

Approximately 3,500 people are expected to attend plenary sessions dedicated to designing a better tomorrow for the world, the Jewish People and the State of Israel.

The conference was the brainchild of Israeli President Shimon Peres, who visualized it as a Jewish version of the major World Economic Forum at Davos, Switzerland, a yearly international gathering of leaders committed to improving the state of the world through global, regional and industry policymaking.

Canadian MP Irwin Cotler

"He had a vision of bringing Jews from all over the world to connect them to Israel and to their identity," says Israel Maimon, an Israeli lawyer, author and former cabinet secretary who heads the initiative. "He came to me and said he knew I and others could fulfil this dream."

While the first conference did include mainly Jewish speakers, its mandate has broadened. "We also want to attract non-Jews to see the innovation in Israel in entrepreneurship," Maimon told Israel21c. "Once they see the atmosphere here, they will fall in love with Israel."

Planners start by pinpointing the issues to be discussed and then identify relevant experts likely to attract participants. High-profile "messengers" such as venture capitalist Yossi Vardi and Bank of Israel governor Stanley Fischer talk up the conference with colleagues abroad, building enthusiasm among potential speakers.

U.K. Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks

United Kingdom Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks is to be among this year's speakers.

"We simply approach people and invite them," says Maimon. The positive response has been extremely encouraging.

"To see the best speakers coming to Israel, and to see so many people coming from the outside to hear those speakers, even in times of political isolation for Israel, means we are successful. We have the same mission as Israel21c, to show Israel in a light you don't see in classical media. When participants write about being inspired by the content and atmosphere and networking done at the conference, this is also a sign of success."

Half the scheduled speakers are from Israel and half from abroad, including North America, South America, Europe, Pakistan and China.

Along with Rabbi Sacks, a few of the names on this year's lineup include former White House adviser Elliott Abrams; Palestine-Israel Journal founder/editor Ziad Abu Zayyad; former U.K. prime minister Tony Blair; Procter & Gamble-Israel CEO Sophie Blum, U.S. economist Abby Joseph Cohen, Canadian MP Irwin Cotler; Abraham Fund co-executive director Mohammad Darawshe; IMAX CEO Richard Gelfond; former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger; Harvard Medical School professor of pediatrics Dr. Judy Lieberman; Rome Chief Rabbi Riccardo Shmuel Di Segni; New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman and architect Moshe Safdie.

"None of the speakers gets a fee for the lecture, which is unusual," says Maimon. "For some, we pay for their flight and accommodations."

A conference of this calibre is quite expensive to pull off, even without honorariums. Maimon estimates the budget at $3.2 million, financed by contributors who believe in the event's potential to boost Israel's image to the outside world.

The sheer number of speakers and topics makes it impossible for participants to attend all sessions. This is not an oversight, says Maimon.

"We want to face them with the dilemma of 'Where am I going? What am I missing?' With six panels going on in one time frame, they won't be able to go to everything."

To make things more interesting, this year's conference offers a variety of forums, such as one-on-one presentations and round tables.

In addition to plenary sessions on energy, marketing, new media and global economy, the conference will explore the future of such topics as Middle East extremism; nuclear proliferation; world hunger; alternative energy; space exploration; U.S.-Israel relations; brain research; economics; medical innovations and moral dilemmas; Israel and the Diaspora; Jewish philanthropy; European Jewry; religion, politics and international relations; Israel's economy; and, of course, peace prospects.

If concrete solutions come out of the conference, that would be icing on the cake. "Our goal is more modest than at Davos," says Maimon. "We try to stay in the field of giving a platform to raise and discuss issues. Our ultimate goal is to... discuss openly in Israel issues that are challenging not only Israelis and Jewish people but also the world."

Terror attack reshapes identity of Israelis from Russia

Dina Kraft
JTA

Faina Dorfman, who immigrated to Israel from Uzbekistan hoping that her only child would have a better life here, walks along a stretch of beach just south of a tattered seaside disco in Tel Aviv called the Dolphinarium.

Ten years ago, a young Palestinian detonated a bomb packed with nails and bullets as he stood amid a crowd waiting to be let inside for a night of dancing.

The suicide bomber stole away the life of Dorfman's 15-year-old daughter, Yevgenia (known as Genya), along with the lives of 20 others, most of them teenage immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

"The world is a crazy place where people kill each other and never learn," said Dorfman, a strong sea breeze blowing as she spoke. "Like everyone else, I never thought this madness would reach me, my family."

The June 1, 2001, attack, which also wounded more than 100, would become seared into the Israeli consciousness as one of the most infamous of the second intifadah.

For Russian-speaking immigrants, the bombing marked an initiation to the reality of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that would bring them into the fold of Israeli society in the most painful of ways.

"It was seen as sort of a rite of passage, as it is described in anthropological terms," said Larissa Remennick, a professor of sociology at Bar-Ilan University. "To become one of 'us' is to demonstrate participation in a national log of losses, that you, too, have paid a toll.

"Despite the terrible nature of this tragedy, the Russian community, if it can be called a community, was kind of christened in blood together," said Remennick, whose research focuses on Russian Jewish immigrants around the world.

In the 10 years since, Russian-speaking immigrants have gone on to pay a disproportionate toll in terms of suffering, some experts argue, as many live in border areas in northern and southern Israel that have been the repeated targets of rocket attacks by terrorists in Gaza and Lebanon.

Ruth Bar-On, founder of SELAH, an acronym for the Israel Crisis Management Center, which assists immigrants affected by sudden tragedy, rejects the idea, expressed at the time of the attack, that such suffering is a way into the Israeli collective.

Instead, Bar-On points to the outpouring of compassion and support by native Israelis seeking to help the families of those killed or injured following the attack.

Some 600 people volunteered their services within two days after the explosion, she said.

"It was a turning point, this wave of support, compassion and generosity," Bar-On said.

"It is something that touched everyone... because everyone wants a better future for children, and all the parents repeated this description of this being why they had come here," she said, referring to those who had lost children in the attack. "It's something that touched every Israeli.

Young Israelis in 2001 mourn for friends who were killed at the Dolphinarium disco. [File photo Israel Sun]

"And Israelis also simply got to know these families, whether bereaved or of the wounded, and got to know the young people affected because of the massive media attention."

Dorfman, a museum curator in her native city of Tashkent, who after immigrating to Israel in 1994 cleaned apartments and stairwells to support herself and Genya, said she might not have survived the tragedy without the support she received from SELAH volunteers and other Israelis.

"If something like this happened in Tashkent, I would have been totally alone in coping, but here there was so much support," she said.

Dorfman remains in touch with fellow members of a support group that SELAH formed of bereaved parents from the Dolphinarium attack. She also travelled with the group for what the organization calls healing retreats.

The attack transformed so much, she said, but it also reshaped her identity.

"Before, when I would say how 'we' did things, I was referring to life in the FSU [former Soviet Union] because I did not feel as deeply part of society then. After the attack when I spoke of 'we' and 'us,' I meant as an Israeli," she said.

With her daughter at the time of the attack was Genya's best friend, Sonya Shistik. The two had been classmates and neighbours in the Tel Aviv suburb of Bat Yam, their bond forged in a ballet class where both were serious dancers.

Both were critically injured from the bomb and left unconscious for days. Genya died of her wounds 2-1/2 weeks later – on June 19, the same day Shistik, by then conscious, turned 16 and asked what happened to her friend.

Shistik, who spent months in the hospital and had multiple operations, said it was too painful to speak about the attack. But she offered that like Dorfman, she also felt her identity transition from feeling somewhat like an outsider as an immigrant to feeling more rooted here.

"I felt more Israeli after the attack," said Shistik, who immigrated to Israel from Siberia as a young girl. She added, "It had something to do about being connected to an event so specifically part of the conflict."

Now 25 and living in Jerusalem, Shistik works doing voice and movement therapy.

Michael Philippov, a researcher at the Israel Democracy Institute specializing in the political behaviour of immigrants to Israel from the former Soviet Union, said the disproportionate number of immigrants affected by terror and rocket attacks has done nothing to dampen their nationalistic spirit but has made them more likely to leave the country.

"People don't talk about it, but the fact that immigrants have been relatively hurt more by such attacks has led to various processes," most notably the decision to make their lives elsewhere, he said, often in Canada, Australia or larger cities in Russia.

According to statistics, some 90,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union who came to Israel as part of the historic wave of immigration that began with the fall of the Iron Curtain have left the country. But Philippov said the figures do not include immigrants who have left but return annually to visit relatives here, estimating the real figure to be significantly higher.

He cited government statistics that revealed approximately 60 per cent of those who emigrated from Israel in recent years were Russian-speaking immigrants.

"When asked why they leave in surveys, they said that they feel more affected... and under threat than sabras," he said, referring to native-born Israelis.

Meanwhile Dorfman, the bereaved mother, feels that Israel is home. She says she tries to focus on the beauty of everyday life and volunteers at SELAH, where she teaches workshops to other bereaved immigrants on how to harness a bit of that beauty through the art of flower arranging.

Helping others, Dorfman said, "helps me move forward."

Remembering the raid on Entebbe...

The bicentennial of American independence was commemorated in a heroic testament to freedom and human dignity that was not anticipated even two weeks before the anniversary itself on July 4, 1976.

On June 27, 1976, Palestinian terrorists and their supporters hijacked an Air France flight shortly after it had lifted off from Athens en route to Paris. The flight had originated in Tel Aviv. It carried 248 passengers and a crew of 12 and was diverted eventually to Entebbe, Uganda.

At the airport in Entebbe, the four hijackers were joined by four more terrorists. They separated the Israelis from the other passengers and threatened their hostages with death unless the government of Israel complied with their various demands. The captain of the crew, Michel Bacos, and his crew refused to abandon the Israelis.

In a daring nighttime raid that would subsequently be studied by other countries' armed forces as a model for commando rescue operations, Israel sent an elite force of commandos some 4,000 kilometres to Uganda to rescue the hostages.

In the ensuing battle, 103 hostages were rescued. The commander of the operation, see the photo at left, Lt.- Col. Yonatan Netanyahu, was the only Israeli soldier to die in the rescue. He was the older brother of Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. Three hostages died in the operation; one was susequently murdered in a hospital by Ugandan soldiers. All the hijackers were killed. To this day, the rescue remains as a powerful symbol of the extent to which Israel will go to defend its people.

Israeli hotels offer packages for tourists with children

Steve Walz
Special to The CJN

Have you ever dreamed of checking into a first-class hotel and finding a teenage counsellor ready, willing and able to whisk the kids away to an entertainment oasis especially for them? Fantasy Island? Well, almost.

Fantasy meets reality every summer at major Israeli hotels. They offer family vacation packages that include indoor and outdoor activities for kids, spas for parents and amazing gastronomic adventures for the entire clan.

It wasn't that long ago that Israeli hotel owners put together their summer programs with strictly their Israeli clientele in mind. However, as tourism has grown dramatically during the past few years, Israeli hotel managers have recalibrated their programs to lure American and European families.

The larger Israeli hotel chains are renowned for investing hefty amounts of shekels on titillating summertime tourist experiences.

Fattal, the country's largest hotel chain, which features 29 hotels under different names, including Herods, Leonardo and Le Meridien, is known for its fun-filled family vacation packages.

"The Fattal chain has built a value-for-the-money concept that is based on a year-round vacation experiences, not just summertime, which of course represents the height of the tourism season," said Roni Aloni, Fattal's vice-president of marketing and sales.

"At our resort hotels in Eilat, Tiberias and the Dead Sea, we offer several types of cultural happenings, from in-house entertainment troupes performing for the kids and adults, to headlining some of the top stars in Israeli pop music. All of these events are offered to guests free of charge, which has made our resort hotels a big hit with families."

Leonardo (Fattal) Tiberias Hotel Kids Club

The new Herods Tel Aviv (the former Sheraton Moriah) has been redesigned from top-to-bottom to reflect the cultural glory of 1930s Tel Aviv. When you enter the lobby, it's as if you've entered an Israeli-version of a Hollywood movie set.

"We spent over $20 million remodelling the facility, in order to create a true theme hotel," Aloni said. "It's a unique property, with a unique environment located along the beautiful Tel Aviv beachfront that accentuates the best of everything, whether it's for a visiting businessperson or families.

Nothing like an Israeli breakfast

"The Herods Tel Aviv showcases luxury accommodations with an outdoor pool, indoor spa, themed culinary offerings in the dining room and 1930s-style restaurants. In fact, throughout our entire hotel chain, guests will discover a healthy and delicious gastronomic experience, featuring lots of salads and fruits for adults and children.

"For guests from abroad, there is nothing like a lavish Israeli-style breakfast, which is a sight for the eyes and a treat for the stomach," he added.

In Jerusalem, things might be a bit more laid-back than in Tel Aviv with its 24/7 action-packed pace, but that doesn't mean hotels in the Holy City are offering anything less in terms of fascinating vacation packages to guests with children.

"We have been anticipating this demand for summertime fun for the entire family from our overseas clientele for awhile now. Based on the feedback that we have received, the hotel's summer activities have become a key attraction for our guests," said Ilan Brenner, assistant general manager of marketing and sales at the Inbal Jerusalem Hotel.

The Inbal's "singularity" (it is not part of a large chain) is actually a marketing advantage. It's located adjacent to the Old City and features beautiful interior and exterior architectural design. The Inbal offers many summertime perks for families with children, including adjoining rooms and spacious family units, poolside grill bar for adults and children, kids club and pool, state-of-the-art spa and health club for the parents, and even a kids TV channel.

"Because the hotel is isolated from the hustle and bustle of the city and located next to a very quiet park [Liberty Bell Park], the parents can actually sample a bit of paradise in the Holy City," Brenner said. "We've tried to anticipate every detail, right down to featuring a kids TV channel. In other words, while mom and dad can watch the news or a movie in peace in their room, the youngsters can enjoy SpongeBob next door, without disturbing their parents.

"We offer a variety of family vacation packages, some of which include freebies to a number of cultural sites including the Biblical Zoo, which is considered one of the top tourism venues in all of Israel. We are constantly looking to entice our guests with a variety of amenities that will make their stay an unforgettable experience," Brenner added.

There are many enticing vacation packages to choose from at Israeli hotels. We've compiled a list of the top hotels across the country.

Inbal Jerusalem Hotel

There are a variety of family vacation packages to choose from with discounted rates based on the number of nights stayed at the hotel. Relax in the peaceful Galilee

A Ruth Rimonim Safed suite

Steve Walz
Special to The CJN

It's a bird, it's a plane... it's the stars of the hit FOX-TV series House frolicking in the Sea of Galilee?

While hunky Jesse Spencer (Dr. Chase) was valiantly attempting to "walk on water," Amber Tamblyn (Dr. Masters) was admiring the beautiful rings and bracelets she had purchased the day before in Safed's captivating Artists' Colony.

The entourage, which also included Omar Epps (Dr. Foreman), Lisa Edelstein (Dr. Cuddy) and the show's creator and producer, David Shore, toured Northern Israel as part of a week-long America's Voices in Israel (AVI) organizational initiative, led by its director, Irwin Katsof.

AVI's goal? Simple. Expose influential personalities to the beauty of Israel. All of the stars admired the serene beauty of the Galilee region.

"It was just so much fun to able to relax and get away from it all, even if it was only for a day. It's just so peaceful and beautiful up here," Tamblyn said.

And that is indeed the selling point for a number of posh Galilean boutique hotels, which are located around the mountainous town of Safed and along the banks of Lake Kinneret (Sea of Galilee) in the city of Tiberias below.

"The pastoral beauty, fresh air and unique historical mystique of Safed and the Galilee region [make this] the perfect place for tourists who wish to get away from the big city and just relax," said Nadav Brada, general manager of the Ruth Rimonim Safed Hotel.

In Safed, tourists can walk through the narrow alleyways of the Old City and pray in one of the spectacular ancient synagogues. The popular Lecha Dodi (Come My Beloved) Friday night sing-along prayer was actually composed in one of the town's ancient synagogues by 16th-century Safed Kabbalist, Rabbi Shlomo Halevi Alkabetz. The adjacent Artists' Colony boasts some of Israel's most unique jewelry and art galleries. Just bring cash and a willingness to bargain with the locals, who are only too happy to partake in a bit of Middle East marketing.

The Ruth Rimonim Safed Hotel (http://english.rimonim.com) is a unique boutique facility, where part of the structure dates back over 300 years, to the time when the Ottoman Empire ruled over the region.

"Of the 77 rooms in the hotel, 36 are located in the ancient part of the hotel," Brada said. "Every one of the rooms in the hotel is designed in a different manner, which is what makes it so unique.

Wine cellars, spas delight guests

Hacienda Forestview Hotel

"We also have a fully stocked wine cellar, where we feature musical entertainment every evening, a spa and a swimming pool that faces in the direction of mystical Mt. Meron, as well as delicious food in our dining room. Our guests, many of whom come from abroad, enjoy our free guided tours [twice a week] through the Old City and the Artists Colony."

As you wind your way down from Safed to Tiberias about 15 minutes away, you can see with the naked eye that Lake Kinneret and the adjacent Golan Heights are abuzz with various types of outdoor activities.

"This is a place where families and kids can enjoy so many types of water sports, including kayaking, motor-boating, jet-skiing, as well as horse-back riding, jeeping and even rappelling across the Golan Heights," said Omar Assle, manager of the Rimonim Galei Kinneret Hotel.

For those tourists who enjoy culinary exercises, sans the Indiana Jones adrenaline spike, the Galilee and Golan Heights regions sport some of Israel's top wineries. Hotel concierges can easily arrange day-long treks to any number of wineries in the area.

The Galei Kinneret Hotel also bills itself as a family-friendly boutique hotel.

"We are not one of those big, crowded hotels. Our accent is on entertainment for the whole family," Assle said. "The youngsters go to a Kid's Club where they can enjoy swimming, painting, magic shows… There's even a kids buffet in the dining room. Parents can relax by the pool or in the spa, go to our private beach, and in the evening, they can enjoy a show on our terrace opposite the pool. We are small (120 rooms), classic hotel."

Northern Israel's resorts are popular getaways

Prima Galil Hotel

The Prima Galil Hotel (http://english.prima.co.il) is a concept hotel that prides itself on its various indoor and outdoor experiences for guests of all ages. The hotel's Galilean evenings (Monday and Thursday) entice guests to sample Galilean delicacies served on authentic platters, while listening to live music performed by local musicians. The hotel is also a popular venue for bar mitzvahs, with the picturesque Lake Kinneret serving as a stunning, natural backdrop.

One of the best-kept vacation secrets in the region can be found near Kfar Vradim in the western Galilee. The Hacienda Forestview Hotel (www.c-hotels.co.il), which is built like a Spanish homestead, sits amidst 20 acres of natural green forest. It is renowned for catering to body, soul and palate. The Hacienda highlights three different themed spas: C and Enjoy – highlighting nine treatment rooms for couples with mud treatments and body peeling; C and Relax – featuring a Turkish steam bath, Jacuzzi and baths for reflexology treatments; C and Feel Fit – which showcases the hotel's exercise room.

"When you are feeling relaxed, you are more than ready to enjoy an incredible culinary experience," a C-Hotels spokesperson said. The Hacienda offers a colourful and healthy array of breakfast servings. However, it's the South American-style barbecue evenings, featuring prime cuts of beef and other delectable dishes prepared by chef Itzik Marciano that accentuate a real gastronomic extravaganza.

'When you are feeling relaxed, you are more than ready to enjoy an incredible culinary experience'

Recognizing that kids shouldn't be left out of the culinary equation, the Hacienda also highlights a delicious buffet for kids, right down to the toasted marshmallows and melodic outdoor kumsitz.

Compelling narrative, visuals recall Ethiopians' rescue

Mordechai Ben-Dat
Editor

The publication of Yuvi's Candy Tree by Lesley Simpson, Kar-Ben Publishers, 2011 is a clever, thoughtful commemoration of the 20th anniversary of Operation Solomon, Israel's heroic, secret rescue of 14,325 Ethiopian Jews from the chaos of the Horn of Africa over an intense, worried period of 36 hours!

Written by experienced Canadian journalist Lesley Simpson, the book introduces the remarkable story of Ethiopia's Jews to a young audience of readers.

The Yuvi of the title is Yuvi Thashome. Like the little girl in the story, the real Yuvi actually did find her way to freedom in Israel some 10 years before Operation Solomon, during the series of secret, clandestine rescue operations that became known as Operation Moses.

In merely 28 elegantly crafted pages, Simpson tells the heart-warming story of five-year-old Yuvi's harrowing walk to freedom and the start of her new life in Israel.

Simpson's brisk, to-the-point narration is exquisitely enhanced by the colourful, expressive, emotionally evocative illustrations by Janice Lee Porter.

Like the little girl in the story, the real Yuvi actually did find her way to freedom in Israel

The book is a delight to look at, intended by the publishers to be visually absorbed as much as it is to be read. The combination of Yuvi's compelling story and the superb drawings that illustrate it will be a magnet pulling in and holding the attention of young readers.

Yuvi's Candy Tree is a gentle introduction for young readers to the unbelievable story of Ethiopian Jewry. It is a perfect stepping stone to other recently published books on the same subject aimed at young adult readers, such as Daughters of the Ark by Anna Morgan and Cry of the Giraffe by Judie Oron.

Yuvi's Candy Tree brings the story of modern heroes to young readers. It is an important story.

Israel for Beginners

Mordechai Ben-Dat
Editor

Distance can be a distorting lens. Detail is sacrificed for perspective. But lacking accurate detail, the resulting perspective is often skewed, too.

Such is the case with Israel.

Because of the nature of news coverage given to the Jewish state, which nearly exclusively if not also obsessively in some quarters, relates to its conflict with the Palestinians, very little else is known about it.

Its people, its culture, its folkways are a dark passageway of little information and very slight insight even to the well informed westerner.

Israel for Beginners, by Angelo Colorni (Gefen Publishing House), is a satiric, humour-infused, but nevertheless quite serious introduction to the more accurate detail of what and who the modern State of Israel actually is.

Colorni should know. He has lived there for almost 40 years. Born in Mantua, Italy, Colorni moved to Israel at the age of 26.

Colorni is a scientist. He works at the Israel Oceanographic and Limnological Research, National Center for Mariculture, in Eilat, and is regarded as one of the world's foremost authorities on diseases of aquatic organisms.

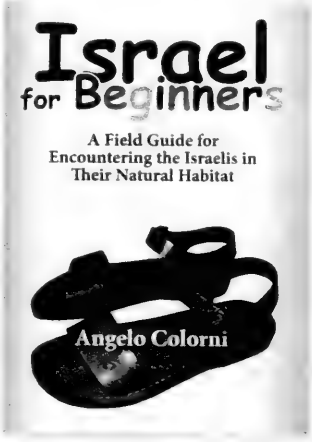
His many years of study and practise of his specialty have clearly fostered sharp powers of observation and description, for these powers and skills are greatly on display in this book.

Colorni writes cleverly with wit and does not spare the cutting edge of his sense of humour when he writes about his fellow countrymen and women. Very few sacred cows in the barn and cowshed of Israeli daily life, so to speak, are left unpoked.

His observations fall broadly into five categories of the country's character: The Language, The People, The Lifestyle, The Land and, what he perceptively calls, The Flip Side of the Coin. In all, Colorni provides some personal 50 musings. Each begins with an subject-appropriate biblical reference which, as often as not, is as much a punch line as it is an introduction.

One example of Colorni's reflections illustrates the wallop and clobber of his approach to his fellow Israelis.

On the subject of "Sunflower Seeds," he begins with a quotation from the Bible. Psalm 126:6, which as readers will see was not necessarily intended by the compilers of the biblical canon for the purpose to which Colorni applies it. "He that goeth forth... bearing precious seed..."



Then he writes, "A typical case of evolutionary convergence of behaviour, common only to Israelis and parrots, is the love the two species share for sunflower seeds. Parrots use their bills, while native Israelis use their front teeth, but both can compete in naturalness, if not gracefulness. When cracking the shells and removing the seeds with the tops of their tongues..."

And so on...

Deftly, with love and humour in his heart, Colorni touches many of the fundamental axes of Israeli life.

An additional very significant bonus of this book are the drawings and illustrations provided by Avi Katz.

Katz is one of the modern Jewish world's pre-eminent graphic artists and illustrators. His skilled hands bring to life the insightful, sarcastic, tender, witty charms of Colorni's mind. Even though the illustrations are in black and white, they still convey the piquant moods of distinctly Israeli moments.

Israel for Beginners is not just for those who are beginners. Even experienced travellers to that country will find pages and pages of delightful, funny and even tearful reading.

United Church wing calls for boycott

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A Toronto presbytery of the United Church of Canada (UC) is calling on its members to boycott six Canadian and Israeli companies because of their activities in "illegally occupied territories."

The Holy Land Action and Awareness task group, a creation of the Southwest Presbytery, or section, of the UC, said on its website that it hopes to "inspire people of conscience to refuse to do business with companies who are enabling the illegal occupation: Ahava Dead Sea Laboratories, Motorola, Caterpillar, Veolia Environnement and Indigo Books."

Targets firms 'enabling illegal occupation'

In announcing the boycott, the task group cited the appeal by Palestinian groups for an international boycott, as well as a recommendation of the general council of the United Church of Canada.

"In 2009, the General Council of the United Church of Canada recommended that members prayerfully consider their actions directed to end the illegal occupation of Palestinian territory and towards reconciliation, including but not limited to economic boycott."

Rev. Brian McIntosh, spokesperson for the task group, said supporters of the boycott are being asked to send letters "to the companies and the distributors of their products asking that they do not distribute their products and to tell them to cease producing in the occupied territories."

He said the task group contacted the companies directly, but they have ignored their request.

According to the task group's website, "Caterpillar supplies bulldozers and earth-moving equipment to the Israeli military"; one of Motorola's subsidiaries "supplies Israel with the military tools to sustain its occupation and oppression of Palestinians"; Ahava extracts its minerals and operates from a part of the Dead Sea that is in the West Bank, while Veolia Environnement, through its subsidiary Connex, is a central partner in a $500-million light rail system that will link Jerusalem to West Bank settlements.

As well, Indigo majority owners Heather Reisman and Gerry Schwartz founded the HESEG Foundation for Lone Soldiers, which provides scholarships for study in Israel and other support to IDF troops without families in Israel, including those participating in the Cast Lead operation.

CANADA

Cataract Pioneer Dies

VANCOUVER — Herb Fitterman, the ophthalmologist who in 1968 performed what is believed to be Canada's first lens implant surgery to treat cataracts, has died. The now-standard procedure was controversial at the time. Fitterman died April 22 in Vancouver as a result of complication from a fall suffered while on vacation. He continued to see patients until a week before his death. The Saskatoon-born Fitterman studied medicine at the University of Manitoba and interned in Vancouver.

WORLD

Giffords Released

HOUSTON — Gabrielle Giffords, the Arizona congresswoman who was shot in the head in January, was released from hospital June 15, just days after the release of photos of her taken in May. She will move to her husband astronaut Mark Kelly's home in League City, Texas, near the Johnson Space Center, and will return to the hospital daily for speech, music, physical and occupational therapy. It's unknown whether she'll ever return to her job in the U.S. Congress. The first Jewish representative elected from Arizona, Giffords had been in a Houston recovery facility. The third-term Democrat was shot Jan. 8 as she met with constituents in Tucson. Six people were killed

Suspects Enter Plea

NEW YORK — Two men who allegedly wanted to attack New York synagogues and other targets have pleaded not guilty to weapons and conspiracy charges. Algeria-born Ahmed Ferhani, 26, and Mohamed Mamdouh, 20, a naturalized American from Morocco, both now living in New York, entered their pleas June 15 in a Manhattan court. New York Police arrested them after Ferhani bought guns, ammunition and an inert hand grenade from an undercover officer. The arrests followed months of surveillance in which police said the suspects were heard discussing attacking Jews and other targets. Authorities have said they were driven by anger over the treatment of Muslims around the world.

Portman Gives Birth

NEW YORK — Israeli-born actress Natalie Portman has given birth to a baby boy, her first child. People magazine reported June14 that Portman gave birth, but did not say when the baby was born or where the birth took place. Portman and the baby's father, New York Ballet dancer and choreographer Benjamin Millepied, who is not Jewish, are engaged to be married. The two met on the set of the film Black Swan, for which Portman won the Academy Award for best actress.

Bill Aims To Protect Circumcision Rights

WASHINGTON, D.C. — U.S. Rep. Brad Sherman will introduce a bill to prevent cities from banning male circumcision, the California lawmaker's office said.

Sherman's bill, which his office announced June 14, comes in response to a measure that qualified recently for the November ballot in San Francisco that would outlaw the circumcision of males under age 18, making it punishable by a $1,000 fine and a year in jail.

"Male circumcision has been practised for thousands of years and is a deeply important ceremony for two major religions," Sherman, a Jewish Democrat, said. "The Religious and Parental Rights Defense Act of 2011 ensures that Jewish and Muslim families will continue to be able to enjoy the free exercise of their religious beliefs."

Sherman, whose congressional district is in the Los Angeles area, pointed to studies in the medical community that show the health benefits of circumcision.

"To infringe the religious rights of so many Americans, San Francisco should have some compelling medical reason," he said. "However, the medical literature actually shows clear benefits of male circumcision. Congress has a legitimate interest in making sure that a practice that appears to reduce disease and health care costs remains available to parents."

A similar effort to put a circumcision ban on the ballot in Santa Monica, Calif., was dropped this month.

Toronto to revise anti-discrimination policy

Aimed at blocking QuAIA

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A motion to amend Toronto's anti-discrimination policy was passed by city council last week.

James Pasternak, councillor for Ward 10 York Centre, put forward the motion at last week's council meeting in an effort to block groups such as Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) from participating in city funded events.

QuAIA has marched in the Pride Parade every year since 2008.

The motion asks City Manager Joe Pennachetti to report back to the executive committee later this year with an updated anti-discrimination policy ensuring that "events which are funded by the city, and/or take place on city property" conform to Toronto's policy of "promoting respect, tolerance and diversity. And that the grants policy and use of space policy are consistent with the updated anti-discrimination policy."

The motion passed council by a vote of 37-1, with eight councillors absent.

Pasternak said the motion is an outgrowth of the need for the city to update its anti-discrimination policy – it was last modified 13 years ago, he said – as well as in response to groups such as QuAIA who "threaten public safety" at public events.

The motion comes just weeks after the city's executive committee voted to receive a report from Pennachetti that said the term "Israeli apartheid" did not technically contravene the city's anti-discrimination policy.

Pasternak's motion seeks to force city staff to "eliminate the current ambiguity" in the policy, Pasternak said in a statement.

Council had asked Pennachetti to review the policy last year after public outcry over Pride Toronto allowing the controversial group to participate in its event yet again.

Last week, council officially adopted Penacchetti's report along with Pasternak's amendment rider.

James Pasternak

"The urban landscape [of Toronto] has changed a lot over 13 years and we have to always update our policy," Pasternak said.

"By passing this motion, council sent a strong message that discrimination is not something we will fund or ignore in Toronto. The current anti-discrimination policy is out of date and out of touch."

Pasternak said that most of the work on his motion occurred behind the scenes, where he "worked hard" to get "enough support" from his fellow councillors to ensure the motion would pass.

"The real purpose of this motion is to ban QuAIA and return respect and tolerance to our civic events," Pasternak said.

He added that while drafting the document he sought advice from different sources – including Canadian Jewish Congress – on how best to word his motion.

In a motion passed earlier this year, the city decided to fund Pride Toronto only after Pride week has occurred, on condition that QuAIA not be allowed to participate.

Where co-existence is a fact

From the editor's desk...

Last week in this space I wrote about a recent visit to The Meir Medical Center in Kfar Saba, the small city located about half way along the narrow nine-mile waist of the country, between the Mediterranean on the west and Kalkilya on the east in the West Bank.

I wrote about the hospital to demonstrate how utterly out of touch the loud, noisy proponents of boycott, divestment and sanctions (of Israel) truly are with the details of daily life in the Jewish state.

Co-existence between Jews and Arabs is a permanent fact at the hospital. It is not a slogan. It is a way of life. It is an every-minute-of-every-day, seven-day-a-week, life-saving way of life at the hospital. About 20 per cent of the staff of the hospital are Arabs as are about 20 per cent of the patients.

They – the staff and the patients - are all too busy going about their important work or getting on with their health-restored lives to be overtly disturbed by the boycotters.

But of course, it is unfair to the hospital and to the 2,300 people who work there to write about them only as a rebuttal to the boycotters. The Meir Medical Center stands out in its own right. The staff there have saved, healed or mended countless lives. They deserve to be written about. Period.

The director of the hospital, Dr. Asher Elchayany, emphasized to The CJN last month that what had impressed him most about the hospital from his very first moments there were the high quality of patient care and the overarching feeling of family that permeated relationships among all the professionals and the patients.

In addition, Elchayany spoke with great pride about some of the exceptional clinical and research programs that are attracting attention from around the world.

For example, Simultech is a paradigmatic Israeli innovation. It combines high purpose with high tech and was created entirely at the Meir Medical Center.

The program's full title is Simultech – the Centre for Medical Simulation. It is an entirely contained suite of offices that enables medical professionals who deal with obstetrics to enhance their training, learn the newest techniques and improve their skills. The offices along with, of course, the most advanced state-of-the-art electronic, computer and digital equipment offer a comprehensive replication of the birth-giving experience from the patient's first visit to her physician through the arrival of the baby at birth.

A full-day training session at Simultech entails 6 to 7 hours with professionally trained technicians who operate the machinery and with actresses who play the roles of the expecting patients.

Theprogramisnotonly for novices. Experienced professionals as well sign up to refresh their skills. The results of testing are not shared with outsiders. The assessments are for the eyes only of the professionals testing themselves.

"Pilots use specialized electronic equipment to train, why can't doctors and nurses?" asked Elchayany.

David Olsfanger is a cherubic physician from South Africa who moved to Israel 35 years ago. He is the head of the intensive care unit and guides a visitor through the unit as would a docent at the Art Gallery of Ontario waxing lyrical about the import of the powerful works he tries to explain to others.

"It gives me a lot of pleasure to work here," Olsfanger told The CJN. "In Israel, you've got to have a mission. You need a commitment. Without it, you run down."

Without a doubt, Olsfanger's mission is the ICU at the Meir Medical Center. The sense of excitement when he spoke was palpable. "The success of the ICU stems from the quality of nursing in the unit. We have 25 nurses here. The ratio is one nurse for every two beds. The best nurses in the hospital work in this unit."

We spoke briefly about the dedication of the staff in the ICU specifically and in the hospital generally, to the thousands and thousands of patients each year.

מרכז לסימולציה ברפואה

"Our hospital is in an area where Arabs and Jews live and work in close proximity to each other," Dr. Olsfanger said. It was quite clear to a visitor from Canada that the proximity of which the doctor spoke is also the governing culture and working ethos of this hospital.

That the boycotters are so utterly unaware of this is not surprising, only sad. MBD

Layton reaches out to Israeli ambassador

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

When if comes to the Middle East, Jack Layton seems to be trying to balance his new role as leader of the official Opposition with calls from his party's hardliners to sanction Israel.

In early June, the New Democratic Party leader met with Israeli Ambassador Miriam Ziv to clarify his party's stance on the latest Gaza flotilla, the peace process and other controversial issues regarding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"Earlier this week, I met with [Ziv] and urged the government of Israel to lift the blockade of Gaza. I also indicated that it was not New Democrat policy to support the flotilla, but reiterated [our] concern for the safety of protesters and urged that the utmost caution be used," he wrote in a June 9 entry on the NDP website.

Jack Layton

An embassy spokesperson called the meeting "productive and friendly," adding that Layton "showed an earnest willingness to maintain an ongoing dialogue with the ambassador."

Layton's website commentary was perhaps a pre-emptive effort to change the impression his party is inherently anti-Israel.

At last weekend's NDP national convention in Vancouver, a small but vocal segment of the party failed to push through motions in support of the flotilla and in favour of sanctions against Israel.

A hard-left group called the NDP Socialist Caucus spearheaded the motions. The same group also advocates boycott, divestments and sanctions against Israel, and accuses it of practising apartheid.

Earlier this month, two NDP members of Parliament, Alexandre Boulerice and Alex Atamanenko, representing the ridings of Rosemont-La Petite-Patrie and B.C. Southern Interior, respectively, were listed as supporters of the Canadian Boat to Gaza on the group's endorsement page.

Boulerice later removed his signature after Layton announced the party does not endorse the flotilla, but members are free to do so. As of The CJN's deadline, Atamanenko was still a signatory.

Calls to the party for comment were not returned.

United Chesed helps needy without delay

Laura Fixman
Intern

Some 30,000 Jews in the Toronto area live below the poverty line, and about 9,000 of them are children.

The United Chesed of Toronto aims to provide support to these people who are struggling to meet the basic needs of food and housing, as well as to help those who can work find jobs.

"We can make a difference in someone's life in a very tangible way," said United Chesed's executive administrator Bernice Chaplin.

She works on the front line, assisting people who call for help, and she gets to know them. One very sick 58-year-old woman couldn't leave her house, Chaplin said, but United Chesed got her a donated computer and Internet for a year to help her connect to the outside world.

"She was so happy that the world could come to her," Chaplin said.

United Chesed was founded in 2000 by Brian Price, a dentist who saw a need in the community that he believed wasn't being filled. He wanted to help those who couldn't be helped by other organizations because they don't meet the requirements for whatever reason, such as being on disability.

"There's a huge amount of poor Jewish people in the city, and I don't think people understand that," Chaplin said.

She said that United Chesed, which relies on private donations, doesn't turn anyone away. People in need require help immediately, she added, so the organization can usually provide help within 24-hours.

Chaplin said that she got food coupons for two teenage girls whose immigrant parents didn't have money for food or rent a few hours after the sisters contacted her.

"We can do so much with very little," she said.

United Chesed receives a wide variety of donations, including furniture, infant formula and clothes. It also pays certain bills for people, such as their heating or electric bills. Chaplin said that the organization helps around 15 people a week, mostly through an e-mail network of donors.

"Once the word goes out, it's amazing how people in need hear about us," Chaplin said.

If United Chesed had the money to do whatever it wanted, Chaplin said that Price dreams of starting a hostel that provides breakfast and a mobile food bank in York Region. York Region doesn't have a one, and currently people in need have to spend bus fare to reach a food bank.

United Chesed held an event on June 14 to raise awareness of the problems of poverty in the Toronto area. "It will make people think how lucky they are in their life," Chaplin said before the event, which featured wine and Scotch tasting, as well as a silent auction.

A man who was helped by United Chesed shared his story at the event. Chaplin said the evening didn't cost much to produce and it got people thinking about United Chesed.

Chaplin enjoys her work because she feels she's helping people, and she said many of them tell her how grateful they are, which touches her.

One woman the organization helped lives in a basement apartment with her four children. Her eldest daughter had had a baby recently, and the woman was having trouble paying rent and buying food. When she was helped by United Chesed, she said it was the first time in 20 years that she felt as if someone was holding her hand. Chaplin said this kind of reaction is why she loves her job.

"It's the type of thing that sends shivers up your spine," Chaplin said.

Six and a half years ago, United Chesed had one employee who worked out of her home. Chaplin said that since she started working with the organization a year and a half ago, it has grown exponentially, though she still works out of a small donated office space in a basement.

Chaplin said many people aren't aware of the poverty in the Jewish community. A lot of people don't think Jews can be as poor as the people who United Chesed helps, she said.

COR logo used by non-kosher daycare caterer

Parents misled, but no Jewish facilities involved

Jennifer M. Macleod
Special to The CJN

No Jewish schools or daycares were affected in a recent scandal involving Whole Green Kids, a now-defunct catering company that reportedly falsely packaged bargain-basement meals as kosher, halal, organic, local and whole-grain, the Kashruth Council of Canada says.

But with daycare operators refusing to comment about the company since it was the focus of an investigative report several weeks ago in the Toronto Star, it's impossible to tell how many Jewish parents may have relied on the company's claims when choosing meals for their children in schools and daycares not under the council's auspices.

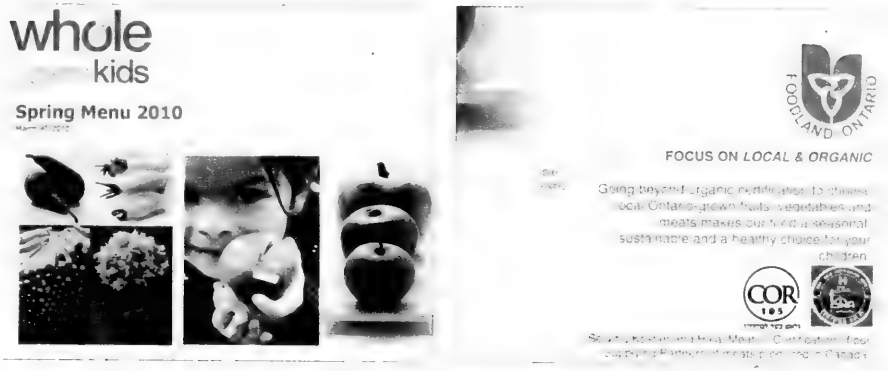
The Kashruth Council, the country's largest kosher certification agency, which oversees the COR hechsher, said it received a call from a consumer before the story broke.

"We had received a general inquiry a while back about it," said spokesperson Richard Rabkin, but a "cursory examination" concluded that "the product was not being advertised as kosher at all."

He admitted, however, that the council was unaware of an unauthorized COR logo that features prominently on the Whole Kids website's home page, which was still online last week. He also said the council was unaware of kosher claims throughout Whole Kids' menus and other materials. "There was no need for us to get involved in a specific way."

Whole Green Kids, which appears to be out of business, operated for three years, according to a "statement of facts" submitted by owner Susan Blouin to the Toronto Star. She claims the company employed more than 40 people and served more than 1,000,000 meals at 75 schools and daycares in Toronto and Ottawa before its alleged misdeeds came to light.

"All my schools were extremely happy with service and quality for years," she wrote, blaming "incompetent staff and personal vendettas" for the failure of her business and adding that she'd downsize with "much more professional people."



Images from the Whole Green Kids Spring Menu

That's unlikely, given a province-wide public health alert about the company following several food-safety violations

Blouin and her husband were renting a $2.2-million Etobicoke home and driving a Porsche Cayenne while charging daycares $3.70 per child per day for meals the company said contained "as much local and organic content as possible."

Whole Kids' spring 2010 menu offered "Free-Range Chicken Breast with Vegetarian Sauce" and "Ontario Garden Organic Vegetables and Homemade Hummus." It boasted that the food was "free of trans fats, artificial colouring and artificial preservatives" and used "non-GMO natural butter."

The menu, like the company's home page, displayed the COR 105 logo alongside the "Certified Halal" logo of the Islamic Society of North America as "certification of our supplying partners of meats," saying that "meal alternatives can be substituted for tofu or special cultural meats based on availability."

COR 105 is the hechsher number assigned to Shefa Meats, but even if Blouin had purchased meat from Shefa, it would have been reprocessed, cooked and repackaged in an unsupervised facility. It's unlikely she did, however, as the Star also reported that suppliers had been asked to write "kosher" and "halal" on meat labels.

Shefa did not respond to calls and e-mails for comment.

The CJN also received no reply after repeated attempts to contact Blouin, who made many other claims, such as buying meat from local organic supplier Beretta Farms. "We have not done business with Whole Kids since Fall 2009," owner Cynthia Beretta said.

Whole Kids also claimed to belong to the U.S.-based Whole Grains Council, which told The CJN that the company made only one annual payment, in 2008.

There are a few legitimate kosher daycare caterers, but the Kashruth Council's director of kashrut, foodservice division, Rabbi Tsvi Heber, said that such "meals would always be sent out with proper seals and stickers identifying meals as kosher under COR."

Inspection manager Joe DiLecce of the Canada Food Inspection Agency said falsely claiming to be kosher contravenes the Food and Drug Act, which "prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet," or anything "likely to create an impression that the food is kosher." It also forbids the ambiguous term "kosher style."

"We take any contravention of the Food and Drug Act seriously," DiLecce said, adding that consumers can contact the CFIA directly at 1-800-701-2737.

"Part of our investigation," says DiLecce, "is really to determine... what's the mindset?" Most commonly, a company buys kosher ingredients but uses them in an unsupervised facility. In most of these cases, a warning is sufficient.

But "if somebody's intent is blatantly fraud," DiLecce said, "we go to them and say, 'Show us [kashrut] documentation.'"

Penalties can include up to $50,000 in fines and six months in jail, but neither of these is common, and "indictment is pretty rare," DiLecce said.

The Kashruth Council can also take legal action if its logo is misused. Rabkin said consumers can call or e-mail the council (416-635-9550; questions@cor.ca) about suspicious products or companies.

Muslims urged to embrace pluralism

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The ongoing clash between western democratic values and fanatical Islam has nothing to do with Islam itself, but with moderate Muslims and non-Muslims who refuse to exercise the moral courage to speak truth to Islamist power.

This is the essence of the message that author and renowned progressive Muslim Irshad Manji gives to readers in her new book Allah, Liberty & Love: The Courage To Reconcile Faith and Freedom (2011 Random House Canada).

Irshad Manji

"Moderate Muslims are so consumed with western colonialism that they've diverted themselves from dealing with the imperialists inside Islam," she writes in one chapter of the book.

The need for the Muslim world to wake up, reflect and make the switch "from group victimhood to individual agency" is the key to stopping the spread of Islamo-fascism, Manji writes.

Speaking to The CJN in Toronto just prior to the local launch of her book, Manji explained why it's important that Muslims embrace pluralism and reject Islamo-tribalism, while non-Muslims must rebuff the urge to be moral relativists when it comes to Islamist culture today.

It's all about encouraging reform-minded Muslims to embark on what the Qur'an calls ijtihad, "Islam's tradition of critical thinking, debate and dissent," she said.

And she believes that huge numbers of reform-minded Muslims exist around the world. All they need is encouragement to speak up against an oppressive interpretation of Islam by many of their communal leaders, she said.

For Manji herself, this is a way of life. She writes openly and honestly about how she has always had a questioning nature, which landed her in trouble with her parents as well as with inflexible instructors at her Vancouver madrassah (Islamic school).

When it comes to Jews and Israel, Manji said the Qur'an has much to say on the subject, but many of these passages have been taken out of context.

"If we're going to have serious reinterpretation of the Qur'an for the sake of religious pluralism" then a discussion about how these passages can be interpreted as both positive and negative towards Jews is essential, she said.

Muslims need to stop "being fearful and ashamed" about interpreting the Qur'an in ways that contradict the Islamist interpretation. Honour killings, the debasement of women and the glorifying of violent jihad are not what Islam is truly about, Manji said.

As a book from God, she said, any interpretation is a human one, and thus potentially wrong. Only when Muslims are unafraid to admit this publicly can a healthy debate and discussion be had and dogma about the Qur'an is minimized.

Manji, who describes herself as a devout Muslim, said it's a "spiritual responsibility" for all three Abrahamic faiths – Jews, Muslims and Christians – to create societies in which "we can disagree with one another with civility and in peace. Anything less is to usurp the mantle of God."

For Manji, this means that the worship of one God obliges her to "defend liberty," she said. "So Islam and freedom are compatible... one obligates a responsibility for the other."

As a freethinking Muslim, she said her own community must consist of more than just other like-minded Muslims. It needs to include Jews and all other so-called infidels, as described by many radical Muslim leaders who misquote the Qur'an.

"I define my community as a constituency of shared values, not on the basis of inherited identities. Which is why it is so obvious to me that Jews who believe in liberty, in universal human rights, freedom of expression and in pluralism of peaceful ideas... those Jews are part of my community," she said.

Manji cited her Facebook community as one of the "genuine" communities in her everyday life. She noted how her friends on the popular social networking site represent views from across the political spectrum, and hail from all faith groups. Most importantly, she said, they can freely challenge one another's beliefs and learn from each other.

She said as a person of faith she cannot abide by the idea that there is a truth that "can never change and should never change, precisely because I am not God. Only God knows the full and final truth of anything, so I embrace the fact I have limited knowledge" and she remains open to better arguments from others to inform her decisions and judgments. This position is one of moral courage in the face of intractable religious views, she said.

Manji hopes that her book and the ideas it disseminates – the same ones she promotes on the Internet via her website www.irshadmanji.com, where she also offers a free, downloadable reformist translation of the Qur'an – will have an impact on today's Muslim youth by letting them know that there are other ways of thinking and speaking "without dishonouring" their families.

Manji will discuss the book at the Toronto Reference Library (789 Yonge St.) on June 27 at 7 p.m.

Media's responsibilities

Some weeks ago, the Globe and Mail published an extensive feature story by Patrick Martin about Hamas. Provocatively titled Inside Hamas, it now appears on the paper's website as part of a multimedia series of interviews and additional feature pieces. The scope and breadth of the Globe's web series is indeed impressive. It brings a wide swath of points of view to bear on the question that underlines the series, namely, who and what is Hamas?

In advertising the series in the pages of its print edition, the paper offers its readers a chance to talk to Hamas. The Globe "asked readers to pose question for Hamas." Ahmed Yousef, an adviser to Ismail Haniyeh, Hamas' prime minister for the Gaza Strip answered the questions. Some of the questions of course, are cries from the heart of people troubled by Hamas. Some are sycophantic by people supportive of them. Not surprisingly however, all of Yousef's answers are self-serving, false and base propaganda.

When asked why Hamas does not allow the Red Cross to visit Gilad Schalit, Yousef answered that "Hamas cannot allow the Red Cross to have access to Gilad Schalit due to the compromising position this would put the Red Cross in. Knowledge of his whereabouts could compromise the position of a valued international organization in the Gaza Strip."

His answer is patent, nonsensical rubbish. The truth is that Hamas has not the slightest interest whatsoever in allowing the Red Cross to fulfill its humanitarian mission – which includes visiting prisoners or captive soldiers – regarding the Israeli soldier whom they kidnapped nearly five years ago.

When asked about the Hamas charter, Yousef answers "The covenant does not advocate the murder of Jews, but for the Palestinians to defend themselves against the continuing occupation."

His answer is brazenly untrue. This is what appears on the subject in Article 7 of Hamas' charter, from the organization's website. "The prophet, prayer and peace be upon him, said: The time will not come until Muslims will fight the Jews (and kill them); until the Jews hide behind rocks and trees, which will cry: O Muslim! There is a Jew hiding behind me, come on and kill him!"

Hamas' foundational documents and its behaviour place beyond doubt that it is a terrorist organization – and officially considered as such by the Canadian government – that advocates genocide of the Jews and politicide of the Jewish state.

It is clear that through its series, the Globe and Mail has tried to advance the vexing discussion on Middle East peace. But we must ask ourselves are there not also any overriding responsibilities on the news media? In the interests of free speech, full and honest exchange of information, and truth, at what point does a newspaper stop serving democracy, humanity and the pursuit of peace and instead simply slide into being a mouthpiece for propagators of hatred, intolerance and genocide?

Politics on Israel Day

In the upcoming 2011 Ontario provincial election, an estimated 96,200 residents have been franchised to cast their vote in the provincial riding of Thornhill. Approximately, 37 per cent, or 34,600, are Jewish. Since the riding was first created in 1999, each of the three past elections have been hotly contested. In 1999, the Progressive Conservatives won by only 343 votes. In 2003, the Liberals won by 796, and in 2007, the PCs won by 1,733. What makes this election interesting is that for the first time, both the PCs and Liberals are fielding high-profile Jewish candidates. I'm sure we are in for quite a battle. In fact, I suggest the gloves have already come off.

At the recent Israel Day event held at Mel Lastman Square, I was shocked to have to listen to one of the event organizers stand up on stage and promote Thornhill's incumbent PC candidate by politically associating him with the prime minister's pro-Israel stance. It saddens me greatly that this tactic would be used at a public event attended by many non-Jews. And if this incident is an example of what we are to expect in the months ahead, coupled with the demand for public funding for Jewish education from many, but not all of Thornhill's Jewish community, I can just imagine the negative response we will see emanating from the riding's remaining 61,600 non-Jewish voters. To quote former U.S. president Theodore Roosevelt: "The most practical kind of politics is the politics of decency." Based on what I observed during Israel Day, I somehow doubt we will see too much of this happening in Thornhill.

The Megillah narrative

I always enjoy reading Rabbi Dow Marmur's insightful columns. I would like to amplify on an important point he raised in his column "Artistic creativity and interfaith co-operation" (June 10). Rabbi Marmur indicates that there is some measure of question regarding the historicity of the events of Purim. He is absolutely correct. There are a number of rabbinic disputes regarding the unspoken details of the Megillah narrative. For example, Rashi and Tosafot, in their respective talmudic commentaries to Menachot 64b, argue whether the protagonist, Mordechai, lived until the end of the Second Temple era. Likewise, Rashi and Tosafot clash in their commentaries to Rosh Hashanah 3b-4a whether or not Darius was the son of Esther. On details of this nature, there is indeed plenty of room for rabbinic luminaries to disagree, and it is to this sphere of inquiry that Rabbi Marmur refers. At the same time, I presume that there is general rabbinic agreement that the basic event of the Megillah actually occurred (even though we do not know the background details), because the author of the Megillah is identified by the Talmud in Megillah 14a as a prophetess, and Maimonides' sixth principle of faith (of 13) is to believe that the words of the prophets are true.

Shoresh Jewish Environmental Programs

Thank you for featuring Shoresh's Kavanah Garden in The CJN's Heebonics section ("Kavanah Garden entwines Judaism with environmentalism," June 2). One thing I would like to add is that Shoresh's Kavanah Garden would not exist without the support of our community partners. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has graciously given us permission to develop the Kavanah Garden on their land at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus while also providing us with financial and capacity building support. As well, we are grateful for the support of our granting agencies, including Environment Canada, the Ontario Trillium Foundation, Earth Day Canada and the Natan Fund.

Looking for an old friend

I am looking for an old school friend from 52 years ago. She may be in Canada. Her brother, Eric Levine, immigrated to Canada about 52 years ago. His family in Manchester, England, had an umbrella repair shop on Bury New Road. His sister was my friend, Myra Levine, who would be 67 now. Our school was Waterloo Road Jewish School, and we then went on to Wilton Polygon Jewish School.

Journalist discovers Peruvian Jews died in the Holocaust

Roxana Olivera

Growing up in Catholic Peru, journalist Hugo Coya knew very little about the Holocaust. At school, he says, he was left under the impression that the death of the Jews of Europe had simply been part and parcel of the casualties of World War II. And, naturally, he never imagined that there would be any connection between that dark chapter of European history and his native Peru.

But a visit to Auschwitz changed all that.

At the death camp, after a guide presented him and his visiting group with piles of empty suitcases, shoes, eyeglasses, hair and canisters of Zyklon B, Coya says he felt a desperate need to understand what had happened there. He wondered: "Who knew what, and, when? Did Peruvians know about it? If so, what did they do about it?" Naively, he asked the guide whether any Peruvians had perished in the Holocaust.

"[The guide] looked at me quizzically. He looked into my eyes, wrinkled his eyebrows and said, 'Peruvians? What do you mean by Peruvians?'" Coya recollects from his office in Lima, a big smile on his face. "I said, 'From Peru. You've heard of Machu Picchu, right? Of the Nazca Lines?'" No reaction. "Then the guide said, 'To be frank, in the 10 years that I have been working here, you are the first person to ask me that question.' Then, he pointed me to a computer where I could type in my search."

A quick search on that computer produced a result that amazed Coya: Twenty-two Peruvians. "Even the guide was dumbfounded, and, needless to say, I was in absolute shock," Coya tells me. "Who were they? Why did they leave Peru?" he asked himself. "How did they end up in concentration camps? Did any of them survive? Did they try to seek assistance from the Peruvian government? We knew nothing about them in Peru. And, why was this historical tragedy not included in Peru's school curriculum?" Answers to those questions did not come to him as easily as it did with the one computer search.

His hunt for answers, he says, became nothing short of an obsession.

Three years into his research, Coya gathered enough information to put together the story of Héctor David Levy and his family. All this, he says, he accomplished with the assistance of the Memorial of the Shoah in Paris, the Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, the International Tracing Service, Yad Vashem and, he said, even from queries he placed on Facebook.

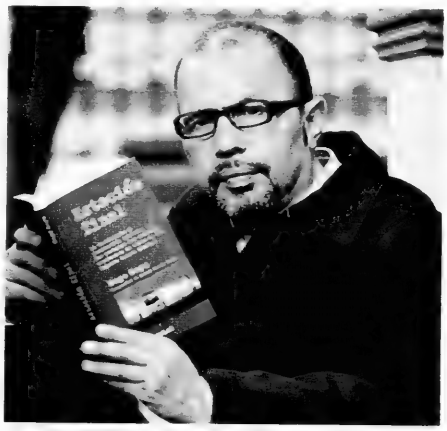
Levy was born of French parents, on June 7, 1898, in San Luis, Peru. In 1910, his mother took him, along with his three siblings, to Paris where he was to pursue a better education. He served in the French army during World War I. Having fought in the Battle of Verdun, Levy refused to believe that his life, and that of his young family, was in danger when the hunt for Jews began in France. While some of his relatives took shelter in Algeria, Levy was caught by surprise when he and his family were rounded up in Paris. On Dec. 13, 1943, he, his wife, Irène; his four-year-old son, Gérard, and his seven-month-old daughter, Michèle, were deported to Drancy, en route to Auschwitz. In Auschwitz, his wife and children were gassed on arrival. On April 4, 1944, unable to endure the hardships of forced labour, Levy was executed.

As Coya discovered the identities of the other Peruvian Jews, their individual stories began to unravel.

Having left Peru to settle temporarily in Paris, Jaime, Rosita and Florita Lindow shared a passion for haute couture. Indeed, Jaime and Rosita had worked alongside French fashion designers Lucien Lelong and Pierre Balmain. The plan these talented cousins envisioned was to save enough money to return to Peru, but tragically their lives were cut short in the gas chambers of Auschwitz in early 1944.

Coya's curiosity about another family, the Assas, took him to Istanbul, where, travelling at his own expense, he says, he had one of his most memorable moments. "I found myself sitting down while a group of rabbis searched their archives for material related to the Assas," he says, shaking his head. As it turned out, he and the rabbis did not share a common language in which they could communicate. Coya spoke to them in Spanish, while the rabbis replied to him in Ladino. Asked whether they were able to understand one another, he replies, with great laughter, "Just perfectly!"

While they were in Marseille, the Assa family was planning to return to Peru. Instead, the family of four ended up being deported to Sobibór. There, Eleazar, 22, and Jabijo, 21, took part in the Sobibór uprising that broke out on Oct. 14, 1943. "These young brothers took several rounds of bullets in their backs as they tried to cut the camp's fences with their bare hands," says Coya, raising his voice. "They sacrificed their lives so that their fellow prisoners could escape from the clutches of death, and we don't know anything about them in Peru?"



Hugo Coya with his book

As Coya carried on his investigation, he found the only survivor among the 22 Peruvians. Unlike most Peruvian Jews who were of French origin, Victoria Barouh was of Turkish and Greek background. In November 1930, Barouh, her mother, father and three younger siblings left Peru for the French town of Béziers in search of a better life. On May 30, 1944, she, along with her family, was sent to Auschwitz. That was the last time Barouh saw her family. She, however, survived Nazi horrors at four different camps.

Coya also came across the legendary story of a one-legged Peruvian Catholic woman who had joined the Resistance in France. Magdalena Truel Larrabure lost her leg after a Nazi tank collided with her on a sidewalk in the heart of Paris. During her rehabilitation, she witnessed the brutality facing her Jewish friends and neighbours. "Shortly afterwards," adds Coya, "she was fighting on their behalf."

Truel helped Jews by forging documents for the Allies in Paris. Unfortunately, the Nazis captured her, tortured her and deported her to Sachsenhausen in Germany. On May 3, 1945, she died along thousands of other prisoners during the infamous death march. Although Truel is unknown in Peru, she is recognized in France as a Resistance fighter. Peru's indifference toward Truel enrages Coya. "She deserves a monument!" he says. "Why is she buried as a mere statistic in some far away archives?"

As for the role that Peru played in the Holocaust, what did Coya find out?

It turns out that the president of Peru during this period, Oscar Benavides, had plans to launch his own version of Kristallnacht against the tiny Jewish community in Lima. Not only that, Coya got his hands on diplomatic cables in which high-ranking government officials instruct all consular personnel to deny visas to anyone of Jewish origin, and to deny admission to Peru to anyone who bears any "Jewish traits." The cables are dated Sept. 9, 1938.

In October 1942, the Peruvian government turned down an appeal made by the World Jewish Congress to grant visas to 200 Jewish children – aged four to 10 – who, having already become orphans in France, would have been adopted and looked after by Jewish families in Lima. In the end, the children died in the gas chambers of Auschwitz.

For nearly five years, Coya kept on his desk at home all his findings about the Peruvian Jews he had so carefully catalogued. One day, he says, his maid asked him, "Sir, what do I do with all those papers sitting on your desk? They are collecting moths and spider webs. Do I throw them out?" It was only at that point that Coya realized he had to do something about his research. "I had no concrete plans about what to do with all that material, so I decided to donate it to the Jewish community in Lima," he says, laughing.

To do so, he called Gustavo Gorriti, a personal friend and well-known journalist in Peru, asking him to introduce him to the rabbi. When Gorriti learned about Coya's research, he advised him to write a book. "He said to me, 'Are you crazy? You want to give away all this work? How many years have you spent on this investigation? This is a book!'"

Reluctantly, Coya contacted a publisher. Ten minutes into his conversation with the publisher, he says, he was already signing a contract to write a book. Before Estación Final (Final Station) hit the bookstores, Coya's book was already sold out. His book is now a bestseller in Peru, and on its third reprinting since it was first published in May 2010. It has even made its way to the stalls of Lima's informal book market, a market well-known for its huge selection of pirated book editions.

Coya's search about Peru's role in the Holocaust is far from over. He says he has enough material to write two more books on the same topic. But before then, he wants to have Estación Final translated to Hebrew. And he said the longest avenue in Lima should be renamed, as the current one bears the name of president Oscar Benavides – the same president who set into motion the anti-Jewish measures.

"It is obscene to continue to pay homage to that fascist dictator," he says, pounding his fist on his desk. "That avenue should, instead, bear the name of one of the Peruvian victims of the Holocaust."

Tough decisions in a hard environment

On March 26, 2001, early in the second Palestinian intifadah, Mahmud Amro, a Fatah-Tanzim sniper, positioned himself on the heights of Abu Sneina, a neighbourhood in Hebron that had been turned over to Palestinian Authority jurisdiction. He took aim at a man standing well below, at the entrance to Avraham Avinu, an enclave that's part of the city's renewed Jewish community. Instead of striking the man directly, Amro's shot hit his target's 10-month old daughter, Shalhevet Pass, killing her. Her father, Yitzchak, sustained a leg wound from the bullet's ricochet.

In the days following this terrible act of terrorism, all hell broke loose. At first, the toddler's parents refused to bury her, insisting the Israel Defence Forces re-conquer Abu Sneina before the funeral.

After her parents finally acquiesced to Shalhevet's burial, residents of Hebron's Jewish community rampaged vengefully through the city, ransacking Arab shops, destroying Palestinian vehicles, homes and businesses. Human rights groups claimed the army and police stood idly by.

In the ensuing months, several Arabs were shot at as they drove through different places in the West Bank. One was killed. Several were injured. A group calling itself the Shalhevet-Gilad Brigade claimed responsibility.

Later, in July 2003, Yitzchak Pass was arrested at a roadblock just north of Jerusalem, together with his brother-in-law. Eight blocks of explosives were discovered in the car they were in. Initially suspected of more serious security offences against Palestinians, Pass was eventually indicted for illegal possession of explosives, receiving a two-year prison sentence.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Amro, Shalhevet's murderer, was caught nearly two years after committing his heinous crime. He was sentenced to three concurrent life sentences for her murder and for his part in organizing a suicide bombing in Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda market that killed six people.

So where does this take us and why retell this sad, disturbing story? Well, to remind ourselves that some things haven't changed at all in the 10 years since Shalhevet Pass' murder, but others have.

The second intifadah is well behind us, mainly due to the immeasurable efforts of the IDF and General Security Services (the Shin Bet). West Bank Palestinians seem to understand that they won't achieve their nationalist aspirations through violence. Terror attacks against Israelis are at a decade-long low.

Hebron is still volatile. It's a powder keg that's almost always ready to explode, with several hundred Israelis living in an enclave brimming with ancient, biblical Jewish history as well as that of more recent, turbulent times. They're cordoned off from the thousands of Palestinians with whom they share the city, many of whose basic rights are limited to ensure the Israelis' security.

Next to an Israeli-Palestinian agreement on the future of Jerusalem, there are few issues that will be as contentious and as difficult to resolve as those relating to Hebron. That's not new, but it's a real shame, because a truly peaceful Hebron has the potential to become a wonderful Mideast tourist destination.

The lack of sufficient law enforcement in the West Bank is also not new. Ten years after the riots after Shalhevet Pass' murder, some extremist Israelis still believe they can and must take the law into their own hands when things don't go their way. They describe their unlawful actions as the "price tag" that others, mostly Palestinians, must pay when they are frustrated.

Most recently, the day before Shavuot, a mosque was torched in the Samarian village of Maghayer, and graffiti was sprayed on one of its walls in Hebrew that read "price tag Alei Ayin," apparently referring to an unauthorized outpost not far from Maghayer that had been destroyed by Israeli authorities days earlier.

The police are investigating this inexcusable act.

Meanwhile, Amro remains a detestable terrorist who deserves to spend the rest of his days rotting behind bars. It would not, however, be terribly surprising to find his name on the list of hundreds of prisoners that Hamas demands in exchange for Gilad Schalit, the IDF soldier kidnapped five years ago on the border between Israel and Gaza.

Israel has a moral obligation to reunite Schalit with his family. The price will be high. Terrorists such as Amro will, unfortunately, be released.

Life here is complicated. Difficult decisions are made in complex and changing surroundings. Not all is grim, however. Results take longer than anticipated, but there is room for hopefulness.

Netanyahu and the narrative wars

Many of the "expert" talking heads on the Middle East – diplomats, academics, journalists, etc. – are clueless, and this is particularly true regarding Israel. Instead, they project their biases and repeat the "conventional wisdom" with conviction, but little insight.

This pattern was repeated in the analyses of the Obama-Netanyahu speech marathon that took place recently in Washington, D.C. In the Globe and Mail, for example, Paul Koring wrote that the "hard line" and "tough-talking [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu refused to budge," offering "only the tiniest glimmers of hope" for peace. Similarly, a New York Times headline dismissively read "Netanyahu Gives No Ground in Congress Speech."

This analysis again missed the reality on the ground, in which the main issue is not a distant peace, but rather a deadly narrative war waged by the Palestinians and their supporters. In a pre-emptive attack launched just before Netanyahu's arrival, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas (a moderate in comparison to Hamas) repeated the myths in an article published in the New York Times.

Abbas' highly articulate ghostwriters invoked the invented history of 1948 in which "Zionist forces expelled Palestinian Arabs to ensure a decisive Jewish majority in the future state of Israel, and Arab armies intervened." Erasing the Jewish victims of mass terror, and reversing the cause and effect of the Arab invasion, Abbas highlights victims such as himself, living as refugees in tents, while being "denied that most basic of human rights." The tale then invokes the fictitious "1967 borders" (actually the 1949 ceasefire lines), and "occupied territories" as obstacles to peace.

This mythology of Palestinian victimhood and Israeli aggression fuels the continued violence, as well as the demonization of Israel via boycotts and related campaigns. It's the antithesis of the negotiations and compromise necessary for a peaceful outcome. Extending these lies to the present, Abbas wrote that: "it was the descendants of these expelled Palestinians who were shot and wounded by Israeli forces... as they tried to symbolically exercise their right to return to their families' homes."

In response, Netanyahu's challenge on the stage of the U.S. Congress, and before a global audience, was to recapture some of the tortured history. Netanyahu is uniquely qualified for the task, and every word echoed this objective. In contrast to the propaganda painting Israel as a foreign invader, he reminded everyone that, "This is the land of our forefathers, the Land of Israel, to which Abraham brought the idea of one God, where David set out to confront Goliath, and where Isaiah saw a vision of eternal peace. No distortion of history can deny the 4,000-year-old bond between the Jewish people and the Jewish land."

His target audience also included Jews and Israelis – particularly rebellious students and members of anti-establishment groups such as J Street – who have no memory of 1947 or 1967. In place of unabated and violent Arab rejectionism, many embrace the myth that post-1967 Israeli policies and settlements are the main obstacle to readily attainable peace.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Netanyahu also sought to bring this generation back to the difficult realities, reminding them: "Our conflict has never been about the establishment of a Palestinian state. It has always been about the existence of the Jewish state... In 1947, the United Nations voted to partition the land... The Jews said yes. The Palestinians said no. They were simply unwilling to end the conflict."

For most of the past 20 years – when some Israelis mistakenly thought that the Oslo peace process had ended the conflict – Palestinian myths have marched unopposed across the propaganda battlefield. They have conquered campuses, newsrooms and foreign ministries filled with Arabist diplomats. While they're falsely accusing Israelis of violating human rights, Netanyahu reminded his audience, Arab leaders, including Abbas, "continue to educate their children to hate. They continue to name public squares after terrorists. And worst of all, they continue to perpetuate the fantasy that Israel will one day be flooded by the descendants of Palestinian refugees."

The experts missed all of this, and the fact that before the conditions necessary for peace and compromise can emerge, the pro-Palestinian armies must first be defeated in the narrative wars. By leading the counterattack, and giving no ground to the mythmakers, Netanyahu is making an important contribution toward eventually ending the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The Lodz ghetto in song and historical context

In the summer of 1998, David Kaufman, a Toronto independent filmmaker and a klezmer aficionado, attended the KlezKanada music festival, held annually at Camp B'nai Brith in the Laurentian mountains north of Montreal.

Kaufman, a former Montrealer fond of popular Jewish music, was at the festival to make a documentary about the klezmer revival. Brave Old World, a band that had played a remarkable role in reviving klezmer, was at KlezKanada to perform Yiddish songs from the Lodz ghetto – the last one in Poland to be liquidated by the Nazis – written by Yankele Herszcowicz, a Holocaust survivor who had been a popular troubador in the ghetto until his deportation to Auschwitz.

Kaufman, whose intention was to showcase Brave Old World in his film, was mesmerized, "completely blown away," by the band. "They were wonderful, the Beatles of the Jewish world."

He was particularly impressed by Brave Old World's interpretation of Herszcowicz's bittersweet songs, which he had never heard, and reflected the fears and hopes of the ghetto's bedraggled, starving inhabitants.

Impressed by the power and "Brechtian detachment" of his songs, Kaufman, now 63, knew he wanted to make a film that both encapsulated Brave Old World's performance and the story of the Lodz ghetto, which the Nazis sealed in 1940 and liquidated in 1944.

Almost a decade would elapse before Kaufman made Song of the Lodz Ghetto, which had its debut at last year's Ashkenaz festival in Toronto and was screened at Toronto's Jewish Film Festival last month.

During the interval, Kaufman – a former CBC TV producer and director who had worked for The Journal and The Fifth Estate – made The New Klezmorim: Voices Inside the Revival of Yiddish Music, which premiered at the Jewish Film Festival in Toronto in 2000 and was subsequently broadcast on 13 PBS stations in the United States and on Bravo! TV in Canada.

Kaufman, whose first film was titled A.M. Klein: The Poet As Landscape, a 1980 biopic about one of Canada's finest poets, churned out a succession of still more films before finally getting around to Song of the Lodz Ghetto. After The New Klezmorim, Kaufman made a short film on the American Jewish writer Roger Kamenetz for the CBC and Vision TV and two documentaries on Kristallnacht (Night of the Reich's Pogrom) and on a ghetto revolt (From Despair to Defiance: The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising) for the History Channel .

It was not by chance that Kaufman – the son of an immigrant from Ukraine who settled in Canada in 1917 – was interested in the Holocaust. "When I attended Adath Israel day school in Montreal, many of my classmates were the children of survivors. So at a young age, the Holocaust was part of my cultural world."

Kaufman's interest in the Holocaust was reinforced by his wife, Naomi Alboim, a public policy consultant, Queen's University adjunct professor and former deputy minister in the Ontario government whose mother managed to leave Warsaw shortly after Germany's invasion of Poland in 1939.

In 2005, Kaufman was finally ready to cast aside all distractions and get down to the business of making Song of the Lodz Ghetto.

With two foundations having promised to cover some of his expenses, Kaufman devised plans to videotape a Brave Old World concert of Herszcowicz's songs. A serious illness sidelined Kaufman, once again delaying the project.

After his recovery, Kaufman ran into an old benefactor, Montreal businessman Hersh Segal, who had helped finance his A.M. Klein film. Having secured Segal's assistance yet again, Kaufman brought Brave Old World to Toronto in April 2007 for two concerts of the Lodz ghetto program.

David Kaufman

The following summer, he went to France, Poland and Israel to complete his research and interviews.

Since Song of the Lodz Ghetto is "a feast of historical photography," as Kaufman describes it, he spent countless hours in archives sifting through some 10,000 images, the largest collection of ghetto photographs

He chose 300 images, some of which were taken from the ghetto's official photographers, Mendel Grossman and Henryk Ross (who immigrated to Israel shortly after the war). Kaufman also obtained the colour slides of Walter Genewein, a German accountant who was employed by the Nazi occupation administration.

Kaufman conducted interviews with Chava Rosenfarb, the Yiddish writer; Jo Wajsblat, Herszcowicz's best friend, and a host of survivors, all of whom were teenagers during the war. As well, he interviewed two Israeli scholars: Gila Flam, an ethnomusicologist who compiled the first major collection of songs from the ghetto, and Michael Ungar, who wrote a monograph on the ghetto.

Kaufman's documentary, deftly fusing music with historical narrative, is not by any means the first movie about the ghetto. Alan Adelson's Lodz Ghetto came first in 1989. While Kaufman thinks that Lodz Ghetto, based on diaries kept by its inhabitants, is "a very good" film, he points out that it is bereft of interviews with survivors and has a minimal musical score. By contrast, Song of the Lodz Ghetto breaks new ground by virtue of its conventional narration and recollections of survivors.

Song of the Lodz Ghetto revolves around two diametrically opposing figures – Herszcowicz, a tailor who literally sang to support himself amid incredible hardship, and Chaim Rumkowski, the elder of the ghetto who was appointed by the Nazis to maintain order.

Kaufman, who likens Herszcowicz to Bob Dylan, claims his songs uplifted the sagging spirit of ghetto dwellers and symbolized "the transformative power of music." He wrote 33 songs with texts, notably Rumkowski Chaim, A Gantz Fayn Mazltov and Es Geyt a Yeke.

Chaim Rumkowski

"Herszcowicz was the most outspoken opposition figure to Rumkowski," said Kaufman, a McGill University graduate who majored in English literature and co-founded the Jewish Student Press Service with the late David Twersky. "He got away with his criticism, at least for a while, because he was smart and funny."

Having survived Auschwitz, Herszcowicz returned to Lodz, married a Catholic Pole and raised a family. In a tragic turn of events after Poland launched a state-sponsored antisemitic campaign, he committed suicide.

Rumkowski, who gambled he could save Jewish lives by transforming the ghetto into a giant factory for the German effort, remains a controversial figure to this day.

Kaufman is of the opinion that Rumkowski's strategy, born of sheer desperation, was an intelligent one. But ultimately, he was at the utter mercy of the Nazis, whose overarching policy was the extermination of European Jews.

"It's far-fetched to call him a collaborator. His foremost concern was the well-being of Jews. But he was corrupt and promoted a cult of the personality."

Kaufman, an avid photographer whose exhibitions have appeared in Toronto and Montreal, has just begun marketing Song of the Lodz Ghetto.

In the meantime, there will be further screenings in Toronto in the fall and a screening at the Rochester Jewish Film Festival next month.

Jewish education book launched

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The International Handbook of Jewish Education, a two-volume tome published by Springer Science & Business Media in April, was launched June 12 at the 25th annual conference of the Network for Research in Jewish Education.

The academic meeting, held for only the second time in Canada, was hosted by York University's faculty of education and Israel & Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies. Some 75 academics attended the three-day conference.

Twenty-five years ago, a book on research in Jewish education with 69 chapters, 89 authors, and more than 1,300 pages, would have been unimaginable, said Michael Zeldin of Hebrew Union College (HUC) in Los Angeles, who chaired the opening plenary and wrote the book's preface.

At the plenary, the book's co-editors – Helena Miller, Alex Pomson and Lisa Grant – discussed "Key questions of research in Jewish education," with Grant participating by video conference from Jerusalem.

Miller – who is research and evaluation director of UJIA in London, England – spearheaded the project after learning of a comparable book on Catholic education three years ago. She enlisted Grant, of Hebrew Union College, and Pomson – formerly a Koschitzky Family Chair of Jewish Teacher Education at York, and now based at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem – to round out the group of editors geographically, and also because they are "the absolute best in their field," she said.

Among the target audience for the book are graduate students and emerging researchers, Grant said.

Despite the size of the book, however, there are some gaps, she added.

Miller told The CJN that there is no chapter about Jewish education in South Africa or Germany, although the book addresses Jewish education in a range of places like the former Soviet Union and the Netherlands.

Also, Pomson told The CJN that the editors would have liked to include a chapter about the increasing influence of philanthropic foundations.

He noted later in the plenary that some participants had started to address the issue but "kind of froze" for fear of jeopardizing funding. The closest the book comes to addressing the issue is a chapter on the intersection between foundations and informal Jewish education, he said.

Miller's biggest regret about the book, she said, is its price ($599 U.S.). Parts of the book are available online at http://www.springerlink.com/content/978-94-007-0353-7#section=878172&page=2&locus=99.

Pomson said he hopes the book will lead to interest in comparative research in Jewish education, such as geographic and cross-cultural comparisons. "What one learns is really quite fascinating," he said. "It requires funders with a global vision."

Miller said that she and Pomson will soon begin researching the effect of Jewish day schools in the London area on the lives of families. The book doesn't have a chapter on families per se, but "families come through very strongly" in sections on parents, gender and intermarriage.

Other current issues in Jewish education include Jewish identity and Israel education, Miller told The CJN. As well, she noted emerging fields like technology, gender, and pluralistic education, were addressed at some of the conference sessions.

Make a difference. Impact the future.
Leave a legacy.

Chabad Youth Network holds awards night

Compiled by CJN Staff

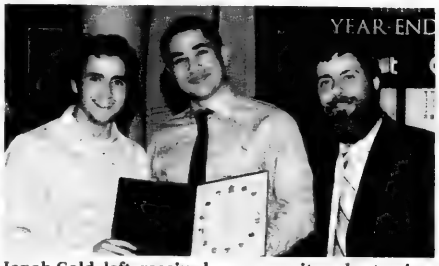
Chabad Youth Network (CYN) of Ontario recently capped off the school year with an award ceremony for the participants of the Torah 4 Teens (T4T) and Teens For the Community (TFC) programs.

More than 100 teens participate in activities and fundraising events to benefit Jewish communities in the Toronto area through TFC. T4T, the educational arm of CYN, offers professionally developed, Education Ministry-approved high school courses in Jewish philosophy and biblical commentary to over 200 students weekly.

At the June 6 event, MC and TFC volunteer Danielle Elmaleh recalled that "during one of our meetings, we decided to make lunch bags for kids our age without shelter... this event was so significant to me because those kids who needed these lunches were my age, and they needed my help.

"And all of a sudden, the test I had next week and the project I had due didn't matter anymore, because the feelings the volunteers get after we truly help someone is better than any feeling in the world."

Echoing her sentiment, two-time TFC South president Michael Saskin said: "It is difficult to explain how much we volunteers benefit from TFC. First, it is a chance to gather with your friends and enjoy yourselves while making a positive impact on the world. Secondly, we benefit from doing such amazing things to help the community that we never would have done otherwise. Lastly, there is an inexplicable feeling of satisfaction when looking back on the great things we have done."



Jonah Gold, left, received a community volunteerism award from Sam Eskenasi, assistant to MP Mark Adler, centre, and Rabbi Shmuli Nachlas, CYN director.
[Ben Katan Photography]

Robbie Raskin, who received an award through the T4T program, said: "In class, we take issues from today's society and discuss them from a Jewish perspective. It's pretty cool to see how some of the underlying messages of the Torah are being portrayed in our everyday lives."

Sylvia Babins, the mother of two boys who participate in both T4T and TFC, said: "We as parents believe that we should be inspiring and instilling morals into our children that will get them through life and teach them to be good people. But let me tell you that there is a big role reversal in my house."

Rabbi Shmuli Nachlas, CYN's director, said that the "teens have consistently demonstrated their dedication and exceptional work ethic, and we're pleased to acknowledge everyone involved for their diligence and achievements."

CYN is not affiliated with any particular synagogue or community. It is run as an independent organization, with a broad vision to cater to the unique needs of any and all Jewish teens in the Toronto area.

SIDDUR CELEBRATION: Students at Associated Hebrew Schools Posluns Education Centre on Neptune Drive recently celebrated the publication of their very own siddur – Siddur Imre Pi (The Words of My Mouth). This year-long project saw students in every grade contributing to the siddur, some of which were completed with the help of an artist in residence. Pictured are current Grade 6 students who completed their projects last year and returned to Posluns for a special tfillah service and celebration.

Leo Baeck purchases school for south campus

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The Leo Baeck Day School announced last week that its south campus will move from Holy Blossom Temple to the building that is now Arlington Middle School, on the west side of Cedarvale Park, in September 2012.

The largest Reform Jewish day school in North America – with 375 students at Holy Blossom and 510 at its north campus in Thornhill – has entered into an agreement of sale and is currently in a period of due diligence, head of school Eric Petersiel told The CJN.

In a June 17 e-mail to parents, Petersiel and Laurie Davis, president of the 37-year-old school, wrote that they expect the sale to close Aug. 24, barring unforeseen serious issues.

The Toronto District School Board building is being purchased through the Toronto Lands Corporation, a subsidiary of the TDSB, which agreed to the sale June 14.

The TDSB had decided to close the 90,000-square-foot 40-year-old building, which is 1.89 kilometres from Holy Blossom, and modify four surrounding schools to accommodate the middle school grades, the e-mail said.

Petersiel told The CJN that the projected cost to Leo Baeck to buy and renovate Arlington would be less than the original proposed redevelopment that was to have been included as part of renovation plans at Holy Blossom.

"We're quite confident that the financing will have minimal impact on our school," he said, adding that there may be a "modest increase" in tuition. Renovations at Arlington are expected to begin in September and continue for a year while students remain at Holy Blossom.

Although Petersiel said he believes a religious Jewish day school is best served in a synagogue environment, Holy Blossom, where Leo Baeck has been a tenant for 19 years, has "a lack of adequate play space, a lack of room for potential growth and a lack of outdoor and indoor play facilities." As well, he noted, its 24,000 square feet of space is significantly smaller than Arlington.

Mark Anshan, president of Holy Blossom, said the synagogue is "delighted for Leo Baeck. We think it's an amazing opportunity for them… We support them fully, and will continue to support them and to see them as close and important partners."

Holy Blossom is still going ahead with its renewal project, but its scope and nature will be different, Anshan told The CJN.

In an e-mail to congregants last Friday, Anshan wrote that all of the synagogue's major donors have "strongly reaffirmed their commitment." As well, he added, "with $18.7 million raised thus far, and with the costs of the project expected to significantly decrease" without Leo Baeck as part of it, "we are now actually closer to reaching the 85% of our total costs threshold than we were before."

Holy Blossom's architects, Diamond and Schmitt, are reworking their plans, which include a central atrium a restored sanctuary, a new larger family chapel, and a renovated social hall, Anshan wrote.

The school facilities, which have been shared in the past, will continue to be used for Holy Blossom's supplementary, nursery and Hebrew schools. Other uses are also being considered, Anshan said.

An information meeting for Leo Baeck parents is scheduled for June 27, and a fall gathering is in the works for Holy Blossom congregants, with details to be sent over the summer.

Congregation opens in Thornhill Woods

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Erin Polonsky's office at Temple Sinai Congregation, where she has served as associate rabbi for seven years, was filled with moving boxes last week as the 36-year-old mother of three prepared to wind down her duties at the temple and take on the leadership of a brand-new congregation.

As of July 1, she will be the spiritual leader of Neshamah Congregation of York Region (neshamah.ca), a Reform congregation based in Thornhill Woods.

Neshamah (which means "soul") owes its existence to two lay leaders at Temple Sinai, who are also leaders in the Reform movement: Austin Beutel and Stephen Morrison.

Morrison credited Beutel more than himself for observing "the need for a more significant [Reform] presence in Thornhill."

The area has two longstanding Reform congregations: Temple Har Zion, about 10 kilometres away on Bayview Avenue, and Temple Kol Ami, which is closer but "has elected to stay fairly small," according to Morrison.

He noted that having a congregational rabbi from the time of a synagogue's inception is unusual. "Most new congregations, at least in the Reform and Conservative movements, start with a lay base, then when they get large enough to afford a rabbi, they hire one on a part-time basis."

Rabbi Polonsky, who grew up in Thornhill and whose family joined Temple Sinai when she was a preschooler, recently moved north again, to be part of the community she wants to serve, and is of the same demographic as the majority of the anticipated congregants.

The synagogue's president, Jeremy Rakowsky, also typifies the demographic the founders have in mind. Rakowsky, 38, and his wife Robin are the parents of two children, age 9 and 7.

Although he grew up in the city, he said in a joint interview with Rabbi Polonsky at Temple Sinai, most of his friends have moved north.

"There's a huge group of us," he said, referring to young families in Thornhill with two working parents, and looking to affiliate with a synagogue close to home where they can educate their children Jewishly. A Sunday school will open this fall, according to the website.

For now, the rabbi's office will be in her home, and synagogue services will be held at the North Thornhill Community Centre, except for the High Holidays, when they will be at La Gondola banquet hall in Concord.

Prayer books will likely be stored at Rabbi Polonsky's house, or at Rakowsky's. "It will require some shlepping," she admitted. "But that's also what builds community, rolling up your sleeves together. It's exciting."

She said she has a passion for working with young families and showing children that "there's a Jewish angle to what they're watching on TV and learning in school, and that it really is all connected. You don't have to put your Jewish hat on when you come into the synagogue and take it off the other times. It's just the lens that we look at the world through all the time."

Overall, she envisions a "friendly, easygoing, comfortable atmosphere" at the synagogue. "I think the overarching theme is accessibility and openness and acceptance."

Annual membership dues are intentionally low, at $500 per family. "People are not affiliating because it's too expensive, even though every synagogue says, 'We won't refuse you,'" the rabbi said.

Rakowsky added that founders intend to keep the congregation "as green as possible" by eschewing the use of paper in favour of e-mail, a blog, the website, Facebook, and the rabbi's Twitter column (RabbiErin).

Rabbi Polonsky also plans to incorporate "virtual tfillah" aspects into some of the services, projecting prayers onto a screen as well as images that encourage thoughts related to the words of the prayers.

"Our kids are in a digital world," said Rakowsky.

Children will also have access to musical instruments "so they can be part of making music" at the services, the rabbi said. "We love to sing."

Rakowsky, who also grew up at Temple Sinai, said the new synagogue's mission statement is "The traditions we grew up with, for today's world.

"I want my kids to know where they came from, and to know their traditions."

Neshamah Congregation's first official Shabbat service will be on July 22.

Learning at The CJN

Marni Shankman
Co-op Student

I've been at The Canadian Jewish News for almost four months now, and my time here is winding to an end.

I first came to The CJN as part of a school initiative to help students prepare themselves for the working world. Instead of learning in the classroom, we learn and experience first-hand what it means to be an employee, in office buildings, hotels and hospitals.

Coming to the office at 8:30 a.m. and leaving at 11:30 to go back to my afternoon classes, I spend my mornings at my desk, updating The CJN's online blog, Heebonics, and working on articles I have been assigned.

At first, coming to The CJN, I was unsure of what to expect. I was nervous, and a little intimidated.

I was worried that I wouldn't be able to keep up with the other writers, or write articles that were good enough for the newspaper. I had no experience writing for a newspaper, and knew that I would be way behind the rest of The CJN staff.

However, when I arrived, everybody made me feel welcome and helped me with any problems that I had, so I was able to adapt very easily to the work setting.

The editor of the paper, Mordechai Ben-Dat, helped me immensely when it came to learning and improving my skills. Every week, he taught me something new about the paper, whether it was how to choose pictures for upcoming issues, how to arrange articles in newspaper format or how he responds to letters sent to the paper. I have learned a whole lot simply by listening to him.

I chose The CJN as my placement because of the Jewish component. Being from a family of avid CJN readers, it seemed obvious to me that I would want to choose it, and I especially liked the idea of being at a newspaper that was so community oriented. The main goal of The CJN is to keep the Jewish community of Canada connected and informed, and I wanted to be a part of that.

I'd like to think I made some kind of impact during my time at the newspaper, no matter how small it was. I realize now that I've had an opportunity that others would love to have.

I have spent four months at an award-winning newspaper, learning, and improving my skills with the help of newspaper professionals. I now know how to update blogs and turn rough notes into articles, and I was even lucky enough to interview the author of a book I reviewed. I have updated Heebonics and have seen the website read by people all over the world. It gives me a great sense of accomplishment to know that the words that I have written are being read by people across the globe.

These past four months have helped me realize that journalism is a career that I want to pursue. I love the feeling of being published, and knowing that your opinions are agreed (or disagreed) with by thousands of people.

I remember sitting in my classroom, and my teacher telling me that the time at our placements would fly by and be over before we knew it. I didn't believe him then, but I guess he was right. My time here has passed by so quickly; I don't know where it has gone.

I've learned so much in these short months and am thankful to Mordechai and the rest of The CJN staff for taking a chance on me, and allowing me to come to learn from them. It's an experience that I will always remember, and I will certainly miss coming in to work at the paper.

חאמזה אל חטיב- הטרגדיה הסורית

חאמזה אל חטיב היה ילד סורי בן 13 שאהב לשחות במתקן ההשקייה בחווה המשפחתית. ב-29 באפריל הוא הצטרף לאביו להפגנה נגד השלטונות הסוריים בעיר דרעה. שירותי הבטחון עצרו אותו ומאז לא נראה שוב. כעבור חודש הוחזרה גופתו למשפחה, כשהיא שבורה, ירוייה וסימני התעללות ברורים ניכרים בה. שירותי הבטחון שברו את לסתותיו ואת שתי ברכיו, גופו כוסה בכוויות סיגריות ואבר המין שלו הושחת. על גופו היו סימנים מכות חשמל. כאשר רשת אל ג'זירה פרסמה את התמונות המזעזעות האלה, גלים של מחאות זעם פשטו בכל סוריה. אנשים הבינו פתאום שאם השירותים החשאיים של אסאד מסוגלים לעשות את זה לילד בן שלוש עשרה- אף אחד בסוריה איננו יכול להרגיש בטוח יותר. חמזה אל חאטיב הפך לדגל שהולך בראש ההפגנות שהולכות ומחמירות משבוע לשבוע.

מחיר החופש-יהודם פירוצקי

אין ישראלי שלא היה רוצה לראות את גלעד שליט שב הביתה בריא ושלם, כולל שרי הממשלה וקודקודם, שעבורם זה שווה יוקרה פלוס מושבים. אך בניגוד לאזרחים וחברי אופוזיציה, לממשלה יש גם אחריות לבטחון תושבי המדינה! משפחת שליט, כמו כל משפחה אוהבת מוכנה לנקוט בכל האמצעים הדמוקרטים כדי ללחוץ על הממשלה שתשלם כל מחיר להשיב את יקירם הביתה. איננו יודעים מה מתרחש מאחורי הקלעים של המו"מ עם החמאס ומה המחיר שישראל מתבקשת לשלם בשחרור רוצחים עם דם על הידיים. מנהיגי החמאס יודעים מה שיודע כל סוחר מתחיל- שעם הביקוש עולה המחיר, וככל שגובר הלחץ לשחרורו- גובר התיאבון בסוריה, לרשימה שאיננה מקובלת על ידי הממשלה הנוכחית. שמעתי מפי אנשי בטחון בכירים שאם הטפול בשחרור גלעד לא היה מתנהל בראש מהדורות החדשות, יכול להיות שהמו"מ היה מסתיים מזמן. כדאי שפוליטיקאים יקירי ציבור וסתם צדיקים יחפשו זרקורים אחרים כדי להשתזף, ואז יתכן שישוב גלעד מהר יותר.

A tradition we can do without

Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz

Tradition is part of being Jewish. There are many traditions that have continued unabated throughout Jewish history. Pesach, Shabbat, mezuzah, tallit and tfillin – to mention but a few – are all part of the Jewish personality.

Add to them menshlichkeit, mutual respect and honesty, and we have a pretty good overview of basic Jewish tradition, which touches on both God and man, the dual aspect of Judaism. Our history shows that as these traditions survive, so do we as a people continue to thrive. Tradition is integral to who we are.

This Shabbat, we read of a tradition with long roots in our Jewish experience that's unfortunately alive and well. It's one whose practitioners know of no half measures, and therein lies the danger. It's the tradition of machloket.

Moses is aware of this, and we can appreciate the need for severity in punishing the rebellion of Korach and his 250 followers. They were a drop in the Jewish population bucket of three or four million people, but rebels are fully devoted to their cause, as misguided as it may be. We know this only too well, as nowadays, a minority bent on terrorism can hold entire countries hostage.

Machloket has disrupted many families and friendships. When a difference of opinion becomes an inability to even hear the other side, we have the makings of a Korach situation. If left to fester, it can lead to disaster. And so, brilliantly, the portion also offers us the antidote.

When the "bad guys" are defeated and the situation defused, Moses must perform another public duty. He gathers the staffs of all the tribal leaders and in the morning assesses the results. The staff that blossoms is designated by God to be the priestly family – end of argument.

Rabbinic Reflections

The staff of Aaron blooms and gives fruit – not apples, or even grapes, but almonds. Why almonds? There's a type of almond that at the start of its growth tastes very sweet, but after time on the branch, it becomes bitter and inedible. There's another type that starts out bitter but then ripens and becomes sweet.

The almond offers a profound message. At times a cause may appear sweet and truthful, but as it develops, it becomes engulfed in bitterness, with tragic results. That's machloket. That's Korach.

Then there are situations that at first appear bitter and hard to swallow, or even hard to comprehend, but with time, we come to realize how sweet they are. That's darchai noam, darchai shalom, the way of peaceful coexistence.

If I can recognize someone else's right to what I want for myself, it's the beginning of shalom. It's probably easier to leave in a huff and declare a machloket than stick it out and share part of a dream. But in marriage, friendship, business or community, putting oneself in someone else's shoes can mean the difference between war and peace.

Machloket is one tradition we can easily drop without fearing God's wrath. Quite the reverse: God will bless our considerate actions with shlaimut (fulfilment) in our pursuit of shalom within ourselves, our families and our entire community.

Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz is spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Tikvah Ahavat Shalom Nusach Hoari in Montreal.

Book collecting – a passion

I donated 7,000 books to a Canadian university library several months ago. It was emotionally wrenching, but less traumatic than anticipated. After all, I had contemplated the move for some time. It was inevitable; who can stem the tide of advancing years?

It had taken me more than six decades to assemble my collection. Three efficient and deft packers, hired by the university, needed only three days to utterly denude my once crowded shelves.

Where did my cherished books come from? Over the years I haunted antiquarian and second-hand book shops in Canada, the United States and Europe. I pored over bookseller's catalogues and spent anxious moments at book auctions. Now and then I was able to pluck unusual and unexpected items from neighbourhood garage sales. The quest for rare and desirable titles – books to fill gaps in my collection – was unending.

There is an unbridgeable gulf between accumulating books and collecting them. Popular and widely read books usually end up on a few sparse shelves in the living room. They may be regarded as fine literature, but they command little attention and have limited commercial value.

To collect books, on the other hand, demands time, knowledge, energy – and for many enthusiasts, the husbandry of limited resources.

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

I was surprised and disappointed how few of my friends and colleagues shared my passion. They dutifully and respectfully surveyed my cherished volumes. They asked questions such as these: "Have you read all these books?" or "If this book is 400 years old, how come it is such good condition?" or "Who does the dusting?" Finally, some benighted individual, out of his depth, would blurt out "Thank God for the public library."

What about subject matter? Mainly books about books, the history of printing, books from private presses, books illustrated by notable artists, unusual Judaica and books from the 17th and 18th centuries concerned with occultism – especially the terrible witchcraft mania.

Fortunately, I never fell victim to the notion that the truly dedicated bibliophile will never waste time in reading books, which should instead be spent in collecting them.

Are rare books expensive? You can purchase the most significant and famous collection of Jewish books and manuscripts in private hands – the Valmadonna Trust Library – for about $25 million. This is a lot of money. But consider the numerous paintings sold annually at auction for sums far greater – many of them to Jewish collectors of art.

It is possible and even likely to grow tired of a single painting, but not of 200 manuscripts and 13,000 books. The Valmadonna Collection will always retain its value, beauty and importance. Not so works of art that suffer the vagaries of changing tastes and financial speculation.

Fighting anti-Israelism in the U.K.

My View

Lawrence Hart

When he was ambassador to Britain – a post that he left earlier this year in order to head Israel's delegation to the United Nations – Ron Prosor expressed his dismay that "the core British values of fairness, decency, and common sense" were "under threat" when it came to Israel.

Writing in the Telegraph (June 10, 2008), he lamented that "Israel faces an intensified campaign of delegitimization, demonization and double standards." Britain, he feared had "become a hotbed of radical anti-Israeli views and a haven for disingenuous calls for a 'one-state solution', a euphemistic name for a movement advocating Israel's destruction."

Prosor's concerns are, of course, well founded and echo the views of so many who have drawn attention to the increasingly hostile climate that Israel – and Jews in general – need to contend with, not only in Britain, but throughout Europe. Recently, in the Jerusalem Post (June 8, 2011), columnist Isi Leibler referred to "the pathological antisemitic hatred sweeping Europe." The mix of what he describes as "rampant anti-Israelism" with "the revival of classical antisemitism" has, in his opinion, created an environment for the Jews of Europe that may be "even worse than the 1930s during the heyday of Nazi propaganda."

Part of the problem, in Leibler's view, is that "in many communities the Jewish leaders are in a state of denial, insisting that the levels of antisemitism are wildly exaggerated, arguing that the principal issue of contention is the Jewish state and that one must distinguish between the demonization and delegitimization of Israel and Jew hatred."

And while there is more than ample evidence that Leibler's impressions of European Jewry are accurate, there are fortunately still instances where the resolute voices of activism and urgency are able to filter through the ether of appeasement and complacency.

Such voices were heard in mid-May at a convention in London, sponsored by the Britain Israel Communications and Research Centre (BICOM). Under the banner of "we believe in Israel," and launched with the pledge that "we will not be seen as the generation who did not do enough," the meeting attracted 1,500 delegates, the largest attendance ever at an Israel advocacy conference in Britain.

The list of (almost 100) speakers included Jewish Agency for Israel chair Natan Sharansky; Israel's minister of education, Gideon Sa'ar; Britain's ambassador to Israel, Matthew Gould; the former commander of British troops in Afghanistan, Col. Richard Kemp; politicians from both the British House of Commons and House of Lords; academics; journalists, and religious and community leaders. Notably, 20 per cent of the participants were of student age.

At a time when anti-Israel sentiment in Britain is becoming ever more strident and uncompromising, it's especially encouraging that the BICOM conference was so successful. The message may at last be percolating that it's long overdue that the Jewish collective gets off its knees and begins to stand up to those who, through word and action, seek to destroy the State of Israel.

And what better place to start than in Britain, which, through its post-colonial geographic machinations in the aftermath of World War II, created the template for most of the conflict in the Middle East in the first place.

The legacy of Entebbe

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

"This operation will certainly be inscribed in the annals of military history, in legend and in national tradition," said Yitzhak Rabin, the Israeli prime minister who approved the raid on Entebbe 35 years ago.

Jonathan Rosenblum was studying in an ulpan that summer and remembers the tension and then the joy. "Complete strangers were embracing on the bus. For once, Jewish unity seemed like a reality…" Decades later, Rosenblum put those events into perspective. "While the first realization of the miracle of the Entebbe rescue will always rank as one of the happiest moments of my life, the memory today is a bittersweet one. For it always calls in its wake the question: will we Jews in the Land of Israel ever again experience the same feelings of unity we did that morning?" [http://bit.ly/enteb07]

Writing last year in the Huffington Post, David Suissa argued that Israel's next "Entebbe moment" should be political, not military. "What [Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu] needs to do now to shock the world is present a peace plan. He should do so with the boldness and precision of a military operation… If Bibi's bold move brings down his government and he loses his job, well, that's the life of the hero… Let him sacrifice his position for the greater good, like his brother sacrificed his life." [http://bit.ly/enteb08]

On the military front, lessons learned at Entebbe may have helped prepare for this year's killing of Osama bin Laden. U.S. Vice-Admiral William McRaven is credited with organizing the special forces raid that led to bin Laden's death. In the mid-1990s, McRaven, then a U.S. Navy SEAL, wrote a book about commando operations, devoting a chapter to Entebbe. [http://bit.ly/enteb10]

As for its silver-screen legacy, Entebbe has proven irresistible to filmmakers. Victory at Entebbe cast Burt Lancaster as Shimon Peres and Richard Dreyfuss as Netanyahu. [http://bit.ly/enteb13] The superior Raid on Entebbe had Peter Finch as Rabin and Yaphet Kotto as Idi Amin. [http://bit.ly/enteb16] Israeli-produced Operation Thunderbolt featured Yehoram Gaon as Yonatan Netanyahu, and was nominated for an Academy Award for Best Foreign Language Film in 1977. [http://bit.ly/enteb15]

After the rescue, the Organization of African Unity initiated a complaint in the United Nations, condemning Israel's "act of aggression." Soviet delegate Mikhail Kharlamov said "the armed action against Uganda was an act of direct, flagrant aggression." But in the end, the Security Council did not adopt the resolution condemning Israel. [http://bit.ly/enteb11]

I'll leave the last word to Israeli ambassador Chaim Herzog, who delivered these remarks as the UN debated the legality of Israel's actions. [http://bit.ly/enteb12]

"We are proud of what we have done because we have demonstrated to the world that in a small country – and Israel's circumstances – the dignity of man, human life and human freedom constitute the highest values. We are proud not only because we have saved the lives of over 100 innocent people – men, women and children – but because of the significance of our act for the cause of human freedom."

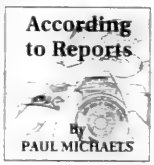
Iranian nuclear threat is more than hype

Last week, the National Post drew upon two new studies examining Iran's uranium enrichment capacity. In a front-page story on June 8, foreign affairs writer Peter Goodspeed described scenarios in which Tehran would be able to produce a nuclear bomb relatively quickly.

"Using data released last month by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) on Iran's enriched uranium stockpiles and the operations of its nuclear program, U.S. weapons expert Gregory Jones [in a study published earlier this month by the Nonproliferation Policy Education Centre] calculates it could produce enough highly enriched uranium for a nuclear bomb in just eight weeks," Goodspeed wrote.



He also cited another study, released on June 7 by the Rand Corporation, which concluded that "Iran today has largely acquired the materials, equipment and technology needed to develop a nuclear weapon."

Both studies warned that there's little the international community – and in particular the United States and Israel – can do to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

Goodspeed cited the Rand report on this limitation: "'International efforts to control exports and interdict trade can now only hope to slow Iran's progress and possibly deny it the specific technologies needed, for example, for nuclear warhead miniaturization and for mating a warhead on a missile.'" On the subject of missiles, Ha'aretz reported on June 10 that, according to a UN-convened panel of experts, Iran has skirted sanctions and accelerated its development of medium (900-km) and long-range (2,000-km) ballistic missiles. These advances were aided by the transfer of prohibited missile technology from North Korea to Iran, by way of China.

In the same issue of the Post, editorial writer Matt Gurney related the gist of a recent conversation with an unidentified Israeli military expert: "While the West remains absorbed with the Palestinians and the Arab uprising, Iran is still busily working on its nuclear weapons and increasing its influence around the world, especially in Latin America. Israel is prepared for 'different scenarios' with Iran, he said without elaborating, but has reconciled itself to the reality the United States will not attack Iran and destroy its nuclear program. The officer was openly dismissive of the effectiveness of sanctions."

IAEA director Yukiya Amano

All these warnings were bolstered by Yukiya Amano, the IAEA's director, who, according to Goodspeed, said on June 6 that aspects of Iran's nuclear activities may be linked to a weapons program.

Amano's declaration is an important and timely reminder that we should be skeptical of efforts by some in the West to downplay Iran's nuclear threat. Take investigative reporter Seymour Hersh's piece in the June 6 issue of the New Yorker magazine. Hersh argued that, while the United States and Israel have been unable to find "irrefutable evidence" of Iran's hidden nuclear-weapons program, there may also be reason to doubt the consensus view that Iran has the intention to develop a nuclear bomb.

Writing about Iran's "booming trade" with Turkey and Syria, Hersh left the impression that Iran wouldn't risk impairing its growing economic ties by pursuing a reckless nuclear path. In what can only be described as unintentionally risible, Hersh related what a senior Turkish official told him: "'We tell the Iranians all the time that we would not like to see a nuclear bomb in Iran. They know the price of not telling the truth.'"

Hersh concluded his piece by quoting Mohamed ElBaradei, the former head of the IAEA (and until not long ago, the favoured candidate of Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood to run for the country's presidency). Said ElBaradei: "'During my time at the agency, we haven't seen a shred of evidence that Iran has been weaponizing, in terms of building nuclear-weapons facilities and using enriched materials... I am not God – nobody is – and I don't know the future intentions of Iran, but I don't believe Iran is a clear and present danger. All I see is hype about the threat posed by Iran.'"

No less than the "hype" recently expressed by ElBaradei's successor, Yukiya Amano, are we to assume?

'Last non-violent way to get things to happen'

The task group believes a boycott is "the last non-violent way to get things to happen. Our position is that as in South Africa, after how many years of apartheid, there will be a response with growing international economic pressure," Rev. McIntosh said.

"I think economic pressure from around the world, applied in growing strength, will cause Israel and the companies to think twice about continuing these illegal activities in the territories.

"We see this as a policy of solidarity with Palestinians living under occupation since 1967 and calling for enforcement of Geneva Conventions and UN resolutions around international law and illegality of economic activities in occupied territories."

When asked whether the presbytery had launched similar boycotts against countries such as Syria, Libya, Iran or China, Rev. McIntosh said, "We don't see it as equivalent to other situations in the world in so far as there's been a lack of international response to Israel and these companies."

When asked if the presbytery was asking the Palestinians to change their behaviour in any way, he replied: "The campaign is in solidarity with the Palestinians. If you're asking if we are choosing sides, we are, as we don't see the suffering as equal in this situation.

"Israel has acted with more culpability, and there have been few departures to violence by the Palestinians since the second intifadah."

Turning to Operation Cast Lead, the Israeli military operation in Gaza that came after 10,000 rockets and mortars were fired into Israel, Rev. McIntosh said: "Cast Lead was a horrific campaign in 2008-09, and now they're not allowing in humanitarian aid," referring to the proposed international flotilla that promises to run Israel's blockade of Gaza.

Rev. McIntosh said the onus is on Israel to withdraw to its pre-1967 borders.

"We see that Israel needs to show good faith… because they hold the power. The Palestinians have no power as a political entity."

The presbytery's boycott policy comes only about three months after a two-week mission in Israel and the Palestinian territories by senior UC leaders. The mission, three days of which was led by Canadian Jewish Congress, was meant to provide balance to the church's position on the conflict.

At its 2009 General Council, the Church adopted policy items that called for full Israeli withdrawal to pre-1967 lines, recognition of east Jerusalem, the West Bank and Gaza as occupied territories and "ending all forms of violence by the Israeli government upon the Palestinian people."

The church, however, voted down a proposal for boycott, divestment and sanctions, in part after lobbying efforts by Congress.

National UC spokesperson Bruce Gregersen said local regions (presbyteries) of the church can adopt their own policies vis-a-vis the Middle East and the Southwest Presbytery's views "are not at variance with the overall national policy."

The church leaders' recent trip to the Middle East will prompt a policy review, but any new changes won't be debated until the next General Council in 2012. Gregersen acknowledged the west Toronto presbytery's views could have an influence on the larger Toronto wing of the church and on the national body as well.

Asked if he thought a boycott could advance peace, Gregersen said the Church's policy is to "encourage the end of occupation… which is necessary for a peaceful resolution."

Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, said the presbytery's boycott "is a futile initiative… It's a campaign that does not advance anything.

"If you want to promote peace, this is not the way."

Ronen said the UC policy has mischaracterized the root of the conflict.

"It's not properly focused. It's focused on the occupation and presents it as the central or core issue, but it's not. The core issue is the non-recognition or acceptance of Israel as a Jewish state."

Political leaders join in Holocaust Memorial Day

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA—Our government is committed to standing firm with the Jewish people, said Environment Minister Peter Kent, speaking on behalf of the federal government at the annual ceremony commemorating Holocaust Memorial Day.

The ceremony, held at the Canadian War Museum on June 14, recognized the heroism of three people designated Righteous Among the Nations for risking their lives to save Jews during the Holocaust. Family members received awards on behalf of Petronela Ziolo and Wladyslaw Ziolo and of Julia Ciurko, whose moving stories were told.

"The threats facing Jews today are the gravest since the Shoah... we must confront those who would, if given a chance, perpetrate another Holocaust," said Kent. "The Jewish people will never, ever stand alone again."

The ceremony, organized by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem in co-operation with the Zachor Coalition – a group of 30 organizations – was attended by parliamentarians, senators, heads of diplomatic missions to Canada, Holocaust survivors and their families.

Grazyna Swist, granddaughter of Righteous Among the Nations Julia Ciurko, and Beata Swierc, granddaughter of Righteous Among the Nations Wladyslaw and Petronela Ziolo, light a candle on the Yad Vashem menorah on behalf of the heroic actions of all the Righteous Among the Nations who risked their lives to save Jews during the Holocaust. Beata's children Paul Swierc, Elizabeth Christina Swierc, and the latter's fiance Daniel Justin Biernacki look on together with U.S. Ambassador to Canada David Jacobson, second to right, and executive director of Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Yaron Ashkenazi.

Buses brought people from Montreal and Toronto as well, including students from Robbins Hebrew Academy and the Kachol Lavan Choir.

Toronto resident Joe Gottdenker spoke about his childhood hiding with a Christian family. He talked about the trauma of being separated from his birth mother and then, three years later, when the war ended, of being reunited with his birth mother and separated from the woman he had come to know and love as his mother.

Bob Rae, acting leader of the Liberal party, said antisemitism is "a chronic condition... always under the surface, and it doesn't take much to ignite it." He said that much of the criticism of Israel is really hatred for the Jewish people and warned that we must be vigilant. "The human soul is capable of such terrible things," he added.

Elizabeth May, leader of the Green party, and Thomas Mulcair, deputy leader of the New Democratic Party, both spoke of their commitment to ensure that the lessons of the Holocaust are learned and that it is never repeated.

Eliaz Luf, Israel's deputy chief of mission, said the Holocaust was not "just a Jewish tragedy, it was a human tragedy." Praising the acts of tremendous courage of those who risked their lives to save Jews, he said: "They not only saved Jewish lives, but they saved the belief that the world was not hopelessly evil."

School merger target date now indefinite

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — As this school year ends, the proposed merger of the two oldest and largest Jewish day schools in Montreal remains just that: a proposal.

In fact, exactly what the proposal is remains fluid. The presidents of Jewish People's and Peretz Schools/Bialik High School (JPPS/B) and United Talmud Torahs/ Herzliah High School (UTT/H), Arnold Cohen and Charles Leibovich, declined to be interviewed by The CJN, amid growing assumption that the plan has been put off indefinitely.

JPPS/B spokesperson Elizabeth Kennell said on their behalf: "There is absolutely no news… Things are on standby, in limbo."

She affirmed that the project has not been shelved, but no firm date for implementation has been set, nor could she say when a final proposal would be drawn up either.

"We're still at the information-collecting stage," Kennell said. "It's a bigger job than anticipated." A great deal more study needs to be done, she said, not the least of which is the legal aspects of amalgamating two corporations, whose histories go back a century and more.

"Perhaps, they were a bit over-zealous – this is a very ambitious project – but everyone wants to do what will benefit the community at large."

In January, the schools, with Federation CJA, announced that they would become one to create a "pluralistic, truly community" school – by 2013-2014.

The plans called for the closing of the JPPS campus on Van Horne Avenue to consolidate all elementary students at UTT's Snowdon campus; the construction of a "middle" school for grades 7 and 8 next to the YM-YWHA, and the use of Bialik in Côte St. Luc as the senior high school. The building or acquisition of a full high school in Dollard des Ormeaux was also planned.

The first step toward merger, which had been decided upon earlier, has gone ahead. UTT/H is closing its St. Laurent campus this summer, leaving its sole campus in Snowdon.

NCJW closing its doors in Montreal

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL —After almost a century of community service, the Montreal section of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada (NCJW) is closing due to a lack of membership and funds.

Its longest-running project, the Boys' and Girls' Library on Darlington Avenue in Côte des Neiges, also closes that day.

Past president Lillian Shoub, one of a small core of stalwarts who have tried to keep the organization going, said regretfully that they couldn't carry on any longer.

There continued to be a paid-up membership, but few were active as volunteers, she said, and no one held the post of president at the end.

The NCJW, which has its national headquarters in Toronto, had its Montreal office in the last couple of years at the library, located in rented premises in an apartment building.

The two staff members, an office manager and a librarian, have lost their jobs. The library's more than 5,000 books are being distributed to other libraries and organizations, including the Jewish Public Library.

The library was being supported by private donors, as well as a modest grant from the City of Montreal, but with rising costs, the revenue wasn't enough, Shoub said.

The library was founded more than 70 years ago mainly to serve an immigrant population, and over the decades, it's continued to be a hub for the various ethnic communities that live in the neighbourhood.

In its heyday, the library offered numerous services, such tutoring and a haven for "latch-key kids" who would otherwise go to an empty home after school, all for little or no charge.

In recent years, children from the haredi communities have been the largest single group of users, Shoub said, and the library had a large section of books that were approved by those communities.

Founded in Canada in 1897, the NCJW has always worked on a non-sectarian basis, identifying social needs and finding the resources to initiate programs that address them.

In Montreal, the NCJW's major project of the later 20th century was the founding of Auberge Shalom, a kosher shelter for battered women, unique in the city. That organization is now financially independent of the NCJW and will not be affected by the section's demise, Shoub said.

A couple of other recent projects, support for autistic children and children living with HIV/AIDS, will continue to be associated with the NCJW name through funds set up at the Montreal Children's Hospital, to which donations can continue to be made.

At the height of the AIDS crisis, NCJW was in the forefront of providing support and counselling for adults suffering from the disease. Another successful project that ran for years was Centre Yeladim, an after-school program for children of families under stress.

The Montreal section was officially formed in 1918, although there were NCJW activities earlier than that.

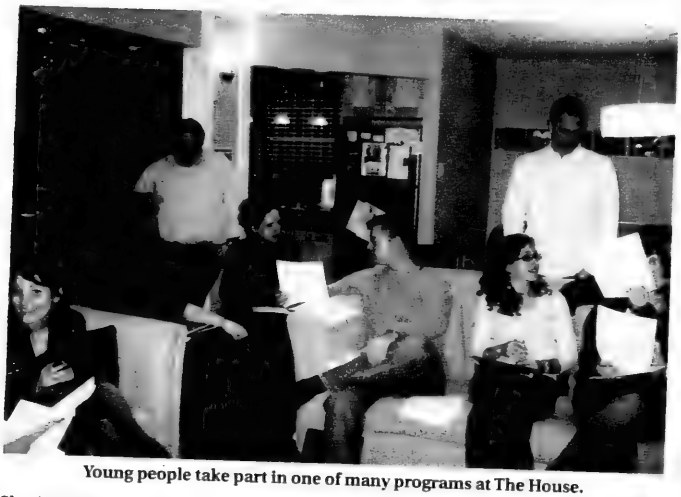
The House aims to empower youth



Young people take part in one of many programs at The House.

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

If you're a young Jew in the Toronto area looking for travel opportunities to Israel, tikkun olam projects, or just wanting to connect with other members of the tribe, you've got options.

When Rabbi Rafi Lipner, director of The House, launched his centre in 2005, he knew he didn't want to compete with the organizations – many of which The House works with – that offer young Jews travel and volunteer opportunities.

"I thought that was fantastic, but the process of sort of continuing that reflective process, that thought process – the figuring out 'who am I?' and 'where do I want to fit into the landscape?' – that seemed like a valuable piece to put in there," he said.

Lipner, a 37-year-old father of seven, has dedicated much of his last six years to developing programs at The House, a centre on Eglinton Avenue that offers programming for Jews of all denominations from the ages of 18 to 30.

Lipner describes The House, which feels more like a bachelor pad with comfy couches, a modest dining area and an unassuming kitchen, as "a place where you sort of belong, and get a lot of value, and feel comfortable, and a place where you're able to have those discussions."

But beyond the programming and the centre itself, he believes that what makes the place attractive is its transparency.

He realized that Jewish youth are wary of organizations trying to push an agenda when he was being pushed to reveal his own agenda.

"But this is just a place for people to feel comfortable, and the agenda is to really empower them through a Jewish lens and perspective that will help them maximize their decisions and understand how to go through life's challenges in a meaningful way," said Lipner, who speaks so enthusiastically about his centre, one could never doubt his sincerity.

"There is no hidden agenda. It's not like, 'here's what we're going to tell you, here's what we'd really like you to do.' We're very open," he said.

Rabbi Rafi Lipner

Over the years, The House has hosted speakers including Jewish Agency for Israel chair Natan Sharansky, Kosher Sex author Rabbi Shmuley Boteach and Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz.

Some of the popular programs that run throughout the year are Challah for Chesed, during which Lipner's wife, Shira, offers her "secret recipe" for challah; Birthright Israel and March of the Living followup programs, and the relationship series.

The relationship series invites couples to a three-session dinner and discussion program that "will leave you thinking, discussing and laughing throughout the entire experience.

"It requires a certain amount of maturity," Lipner said, adding that the program may not attract huge crowds based on promises of fun and excitement, but it helps committed participants build stronger, healthier and more meaningful relationships with their partners.

"Our goal is obviously to provide people with a more fulfilling and successful experience in all aspects of life. I care so much more about the people than the success of The House."

Despite that, he said the organization has enjoyed success and growth over the past six years – having grown from attracting about 10 to 15 people to an event, to seeing about 1,000 new faces throughout the course of a year.

Still, Lipner believes the events, some of which attract intimate groups of 20 to 30 people, "would be less successful if we sold it [as something it wasn't] and pushed people in the doors, and we had people there who didn't want to be there."

Lipner added that he's not interested in playing "the numbers game," by trying to sell programs that aren't in line with their philosophy.

"The success of this space has really been because it has allowed everyone to feel welcome and validated for who they are and what they think," he said.

"We care about the people and we think Judaism has something to offer... Jewish thought has a lens... If you're about to become a parent, there are going to be some challenges out there and someone might say, 'I'm curious what Jewish thought has to say about what I'm going through in life.'"

Regular participants have begun to show their support financially.

"They say that this is a place they want to give back to and that shows a certain commitment," Lipner said.

"There are a lot of people who... want to belong to something that they find meaningful and relevant... Our hope is that you walk out of our doors more than you were before you walked in. But what you do with it is your own personal journey."

NS premier to lead trade mission to Israel

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Trade possibilities between Nova Scotia and Israel took a giant step forward with a June 15 information session and workshop in Halifax preceding an October 2011 trade mission to Israel.

The trade mission will be headed by provincial Premier Darrell Dexter.

"I would term it a success," said Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council, who assisted Nova Scotia Business Inc. in co-ordinating the event, which attracted more than 15 business interests.

"We certainly have more work to do to generate more interest in the October mission but this early expression of interest was gratifying," said Goldberg, who gave a historical perspective of Israel prior to economic discussions.

Jonathan Levy, Israel's Consul for Economic Affairs and Trade Commissioner to Canada, told the attendees about the opportunities in Israel for Nova Scotia companies and, conversely, for Israeli companies wishing to work in and with Nova Scotians.

"I see this as a two-way street," he said in an interview. "We've developed a great relationship between Canadian federal and provincial governments and Israel. We've had several missions from Canada to Israel and the excitement of these prospects (Nova Scotia and Israel) is evident."

He told the audience there were opportunities in many sectors, including a newly developed oil and gas industry with an already burgeoning one in Nova Scotia. "Health care, IT and environmental technologies are other industries that should show mutual interest."

David Daniels, director, science and technology investment attraction for Nova Scotia Business Inc., said the information session was an excellent way for the business people to learn about Israel.

"Most of them don't know of Israel's educated work force, the number of public companies, and of so many who are doing innovative things," he said. "Nova Scotia can offer Israeli companies a close connection to the Eastern Seaboard of the United States by air and sea, a strong port, and an easy connection to central Canada."

Karen Oldfield, president and CEO of the Halifax Port Authority, recently returned from Israel and is looking forward to going again in October.

"ZIM is one of the key components of our port business. We have to continue to foster its business. That can show other companies how viable and worthwhile it is to work with Nova Scotians," she said, while also explaining the vibrancy and excitement of Israel.

Chief justice gets honorary degree

Laura Fixman
Intern

Warren Winkler

The University of Western Ontario gave honorary degrees to several notable people last week, including the chief justice of Ontario, Warren Winkler.

Winkler has honorary degrees from Assumption University in Windsor, Ont., and Brandon University, but he said that receiving one from UWO has a special significance for him.

"Both my daughters went to Western," Winkler said. "The school means a lot to me."

He said that UWO was very kind in describing him as "Canada's mediator," which he thought referred to some of what he's done in his career including heading the inquiry into the Walkerton water crisis and the restructuring of Air Canada.

"I thought it was a nice compliment to me, and it was a good way to put it," Winkler said.

He was born in Virden, Man., grew up in Pincher Creek, Alta., and decided he would be a lawyer after his education at Brandon U in Manitoba.

Winkler then attended Osgoode Hall Law School, and was called to the bar of Ontario in 1965. He said that there's a significant difference between law school now and when he attended.

"It seemed we had a more structured education," Winkler said.

He added that because of the ease of electronic communication, the world is much smaller now. He said this has allowed lawyers to work globally and not have difficulties with communication.

He said the biggest difference between receiving an honorary degree and studying for one is that graduating students are at the beginning of their career and they can't know what to expect.

"It's a time when the world is full of mystery," Winkler said. "It's an adventure that you're just starting out on."

An honorary degree, he said, is more of a reward for things you've done throughout your career. When he was beginning his career, Winkler said he couldn't have anticipated how successful he'd be. His biggest and best surprise was being made chief justice of Ontario in 2007.

"It's the best job I've ever had," Winkler said. "It's an opportunity to make a contribution to law reform, which is something I'm really passionate about."

He specializes in labour and class-action law, which is another thing he's passionate about. He advises young lawyers to find something they're particularly passionate about and pursue it in their careers.

Winkler is involved in organizations such as the Advocate's Society and the Law Society of Upper Canada. Getting involved with different organizations related to law is something he recommends all young lawyers do. As part of the Law Society, Winkler attends many calls to the bar ceremonies during which he gives advice. He said the advice he received when he was called to the bar helped him in his career. He also advises new lawyers to involve themselves in things other than law because being well-rounded is now expected. An avid birdwatcher, he is involved with Bird Studies Canada, and he enjoys jazz, fly fishing and spending time with his children and grandchildren. He said that well-rounded people make better lawyers.

Others who received honorary awards at the ceremony last week include journalist Kevin Newman; the president of the University of Toronto, David Naylor, and activists Craig and Marc Kielburger.

Concordia establishes Azrieli Institute of Israel Studies

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

Concordia University will become a centre for Israel studies of international rank thanks to a $5-million donation from billionaire real-estate developer David Azrieli.

The Azrieli Institute of Israel Studies was officially launched June 22 with the announcement that the Azrieli Foundation has established a permanent endowment to support it.

The gift is one of, if not the, single largest the university's faculty of arts and sciences, with which the institute is affiliated, has ever received. Concordia is matching the donation in kind through various services.

The institute will encourage and fund research by graduate students wishing to specialize in Israel studies, as well as by faculty. It will also support visiting professorships, conferences and other exchanges, and public lectures.

The approach is multidisciplinary, meaning the institute will be concerned with any subject that falls under the arts or sciences, from the humanities to linguistics to technology.

David Azrieli

Research that even tangentially touches on Israel, from ancient times to the modern state, will be considered for grants, said Concordia Jewish studies professor Norma Joseph, a CJN columnist and an initiator of the institute who was instrumental in obtaining the Azrieli family's support.

She will serve as its co-director with Csaba Nikolenyi, a political science professor whose expertise is in electoral systems and has studied the Israeli model.

Other than the appointment of visiting professors for a year or two, the program will not add faculty posts. In that way, it is significantly different from chairs in Israel studies, which is a small but growing academic area.

There are eight chairs in Israel studies in North America, including at the University of Toronto and the University of Calgary. Joseph said Concordia did not want to go that route, which puts the money into an appointee and his work, but rather preferred to spread resources to nurture more and different research projects.

The approach is also interdisciplinary, she said, in that students from different fields will be brought together through their common interest in Israel.

Research proposals by master's, doctoral and post-doctoral students will be considered. The selection process has not been finalized, Joseph said. A committee of scholars is working on that. The hope is that the first fellowships will be named this year.

Concordia is not creating an Israel studies program, as such, of which there are 10 or 11 today at different institutions, including the U of C.

A minor in Israel studies for undergraduates is a longer-term goal of the institute.

The Azrieli Institute is unique. The only comparable entity Joseph can think of is the Schusterman Center for Israel Studies at Brandeis University, but even it isn't as research-focused, nor as committed to the study of Israel in all its aspects.

Naomi Azrieli, president of the Azrieli Foundation, said the multidisciplinary approach was important.

"For too long, the study of Israel gets lost in politics or the story of conflict. Israel should be studied like any other country – its history, its geography, its sociology, its economy," she said.

The foundation also did not want the institute to be a branch of Jewish studies, as important as Israel is to the Jewish people. "We wanted to take it out of the religious context."

Both Joseph and Azrieli stressed that the institute is not political.

"There's no political agenda," said Joseph, "only a scholarly one untainted by a political or religious preference. The purpose is not to posit any outcome, but to seek out fact and open the door to interaction."

Azrieli added: "This is absolutely not a political initiative in any way... It's beyond politics."

Concordia has been the site of past discord between pro- and anti-Israel students, including an infamous 2002 incident in which then-former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu was prevented from speaking on campus by a violent protest.

The creation of the institute is thrilling for David Azrieli, his daughter said. The Polish-born Azrieli, 89, lived in Israel from 1942 to 1950 and fought in its War of Independence.

Today, he divides his time between Montreal and Israel, and continues to play an active role in the management of his companies in both countries.

Tackling child sex abuse among haredi Jews

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Statistically, child sexual abuse is no more or less common among haredi Jews than any other part of the population.

The trouble, argues Amy Neustein, is that to come forward about it within the haredi community and its insular enclaves almost invariably means ostracism, shunning, shame and even banishment.

Those were among the points made by Neustein, who is Orthodox herself and an expert on child sexual abuse, in an interview she gave for a Jewish-focused episode of Sex Scandals in History, a four-part series by Cogent/Bender Productions that aired in Canada last month on Vision TV.

The second segment, directed by Toronto's Alan Mendelsohn, was called Wall of Silence and centred on allegations of pedophilia that occurred within haredi communities in Winnipeg and Brooklyn.

Amy Neustein

"These are issues that upset the balance – the homeostasis – of those communities, and that is why they cannot be tolerated," Neustein said in a recent telephone interview from Fort Lee, N.J., where she lives. "The worst thing you can do is to disrupt that balance."

Neustein, who has a PhD in sociology, has personal experience with the subject. In 1986, she lost custody of her six-year-old daughter in a court system that she says punished her for "trying to protect my daughter from abuse" allegedly committed by her father.

Since then, Neustein spent years overcoming the trauma and has written a book, 2005's From Madness to Mutiny: Why Mothers are Running from the Family Courts – and What Can Be Done About It, which she co-authored with lawyer Michael Lesher, also an Orthodox Jew, and edited 2009's Tempest in the Temple: Jewish Communities and Child Sex Scandals, a collection of essays by rabbis, educators, lawyers and psychotherapists on sexual abuse by Jewish clergy.

Both are considered landmark works.

Within haredi communities, Neustein said, child sexual abuse and pedophilia can happen anywhere: at home by a parent, in yeshiva by a teacher, in shul by a rabbi or bar mitzvah tutor, or even at the mikvah.

"In nine out of 10 cases, if the child tells a parent, the parent will say: 'You're making up stories!'" Neustein said.

And in the rare case where the child is believed, it's the whole family that is punished, Neustein said. "Insular communities have to work smoothly, so they cannot tolerate anything that might disrupt or divide them."

Neustein said families that threaten to go to the police to report sex abuse are coerced into having a rabbinic court deal with the charges, but such courts invariably force the families to back down or face total community approbation and/or banishment.

The result?

"The perpetrator is protected," Neustein said, while the abused go on to live in torment, shame and guilt, or perhaps even to eventually become abusers themselves.

Or, she said, they might have severe marital troubles and other problems, such as substance abuse.

"I've been scolded many times," Neustein said. "They ask: 'Why are you scolding us, washing our linen in public?'"

Neustein was encouraged that in Canada, at least, a "first big step" was being taken by having a TV documentary bring the issue to light. Last February, Rabbi Nachum Rosenberg, a haredi rabbi from Brooklyn who has spent the last decade fighting sex abuse within his own community, spoke in Montreal. Neustein was certain that considering the significant number of haredi Jews who reside in Montreal, the very same issues of child sex abuse that exist in her country, Israel and elsewhere, exist here, too.

"It's only logical," she said.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Cycling for Israeli kids

Abigail Cukier
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Geoff Rose has cycled thousands of kilometres, but his next 2,000 may be the most meaningful.

The Hamilton man will cycle to Halifax to raise funds to support Shechafim Regional Special Education School near Kiryat Shmonah in Israel.

His 20-year-old son, Daniel, will join him, along with Ori Menahem, an Israeli working at Hamilton Hebrew Academy for the year.

Shechafim is a partnership project of the UJA Federation of Hamilton, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and the Atlantic Jewish Council. Since 2007, Hamilton federation has been raising funds to support special projects for the school and to donate equipment to the school.

After touring the school during a trip to Israel in March, Rose decided he wanted to do something to help the students there.

The goal is to raise $6,800 – enough to purchase two Rifton Adaptive Tricycles and two helmets for use by Shechafim students. This would help children with special needs improve their physical coordination, strength and spatial perception, while having fun and experiencing change and variety in their daily routine.

Cycling long distances is nothing new for Rose, who biked to Calgary many years ago. He cycled Manitoulin Island last summer with his wife and has cycled through northern England and Holland. Lately, he's been training with four-hour, 80-kilometre rides on Hamilton area trails.

"It has been a while since I've done a long-distance ride, and the bonus is, I get to bring my son," he said. "We will be camping most nights and plan to stop in Jewish communities along the way, especially for Shabbat."

Geoff and Daniel will ride a tandem, towing a trailer with their camping and other gear. Menahem will ride his own bicycle, carrying additional necessities.

The three-week trip will be more than 2,000 kilometres and the men plan to travel about 120 kilometres each day, breaking on Shabbat. They will leave from Adas Israel Congregation of Hamilton on June 26 at 9 a.m.

The men will blog each day on their Facebook page, which can be found by searching "Shechafim" on Facebook.

If they exceed their $6,800 goal, every additional $3,400 would allow them to purchase another tricycle from Rifton. The school needs seven trikes.

Convert's immigration case close to resolution

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Observers are hailing a small but significant victory in attempts to reduce the power of Israel's haredi religious establishment over matters of conversion.

Last week the Ministry of the Interior agreed to permit the Jewish Agency to vet the authenticity of conversions performed by Diaspora rabbinic courts from the modern Orthodox wing of Judaism.

In a letter to the Knesset, the ministry, which approves candidates for aliyah under the Law of Return, said it would rely on the Jewish Agency to advise whether Orthodox conversion courts outside Israel were legitimate within their communities. In cases where the Jewish Agency was not able to verify the court's authenticity, the ministry would rely on the Chief Rabbinate for advice.

The haredi-controlled Chief Rabbinate had earlier rejected conversions by modern Orthodox rabbinic courts, despite a Supreme Court ruling that recognized Orthodox, Conservative and Reform converts as eligible to immigrate.

The issue arose when the ministry turned to the Chief Rabbinate to determine whether converts came from "recognized" communities abroad. The Chief Rabbinate only accepts conversions by about 20 rabbinical courts affiliated with the Orthodox Rabbinical Council of America.

A case involving a Canadian convert to Judaism, Thomas Dohlan, prompted a lawsuit in Israel spearheaded by ITIM, the Jewish Life Information Center.

Dohlan, a veteran of the Canadian armed forces, had undergone an Orthodox conversion in February 2010 by a three-rabbi panel in Montreal after studying with Rabbi Daniel Elkin of Kingston. Dohlan is married to an Israeli woman and the family moved to Israel last year.

Rabbi Seth Farber, director of ITIM, said Dohlan's case prompted Knesset hearings as well as consultations with the Sephardi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar. The Chief Rabbi chose not to contest the ministry decision after coming to the conclusion the rabbinate should not be involved in immigration decisions.

"Dialogue between us, the Jewish Agency, the Chief Rabbi and the Interior Ministry led the rabbinate to the understanding that it's better off for everybody if they're not part of this discussion," Rabbi Farber said.

The new policy is consistent with traditional Jewish practice in which conversions are performed locally and recognized by other communities, he said.

Rejecting local rabbinic decisions had the potential to alienate Diaspora communities from Israel, he added.

Rabbi Seth Farber

Contacted at his home in Kiryat Tivon, about 30 kilometres east of Haifa, Dohlan said he's hopeful his immigration problems will be cleared up soon. He had moved to Israel with his wife, Ortal, and four young children expecting to be immediately accepted as a Jewish oleh. "I was shocked," he said, when he learned the Ministry of the Interior would not accept his conversion. "I didn't understand it because I had all the paperwork, letters, everything."

Moreover, others converted by the same Montreal rabbis had made aliyah without any problems, he said.

With his immigration status in limbo, he has found it "impossible to find a job." Even grants provided new immigrants have become an issue.

Dohlan, who served in the Canadian air force as an aircraft engine specialist, met Ortal at Camp Borden while in training.

"She told me she was Jewish. I wanted to know more and more about it. I researched it and the more I read, the more I related to it. This is me, this is what I believe."

After months of dealing with Israeli bureaucracies, he still hasn't received the documentation that would permit him to get a job. "We're trying to swim here, but we're slowly running out of steam. Hopefully it will all get sorted out," he said.

Rabbi Farber is optimistic Dohlan's case will be resolved shortly. The new government policy appears to be paying dividends already, with news that a person converted 30 years ago was finally granted a citizenship certificate. That case was held up by the Chief Rabbinate because "they did not recognize the conversion as they did not know who they [the rabbis who officiated] were."

Dohlan too should soon receive his Israeli documentation card. "We're glad that an injustice has been rectified and hopeful that it will be implemented across the board immediately so no one goes through additional suffering," Rabbi Farber said.

Toronto Rabbi Martin Lockshin said the new policy addresses an ironic situation in which immigrants converted by Conservative and Reform Diaspora congregations were readily accepted for immigration purposes, but not those who completed a "liberal Orthodox" one.

Under the new system, that should be remedied. "I can't imagine the Jewish Agency would reject conversions by those three Orthodox rabbis in Montreal," he said.

The policy "moves [determination of] the legitimacy of conversions from the haredim and I think it's an excellent solution to the problem."

Rabbi Lockshin, who teaches Jewish studies at York University, said the policy doesn't address a much bigger problem within Israel that involves hundreds of thousands of immigrants, mostly from the former Soviet Union.

These are people not halachically Jewish but who would like to join the Jewish fold. Israel had set up a special State Conversion Authority headed by Rabbi Chaim Druckman, but their conversions have also been rejected by haredi courts, he said.

"I knew Rabbi Druckman. I never saw him as liberal Orthodox. He was straight line Orthodox."

Rabbi Druckman can be considered on the right wing of the Orthodox movement and when he was given the task of integrating thousands of immigrants, "he recognized the enormity of the problem. He felt Jewish law demanded a lenient approach but he still took seriously the requirements of Jewish law."

Rabbi Lockshin speculated the haredi rabbinate backed off the foreign conversion issue because "not that many converts are moving to Israel."

The new policy "makes it a little easier for liberal Orthodox rabbis in North America...From the Israeli perspective, it's a minor victory," Rabbi Lockshin said.

As for Dohlan, he doesn't regret his choice of moving to Israel despite his yet unresolved immigration status.

"It's the best decision for us, especially for the children. It's the best place to raise kids," he said. "This is where the Jewish people are from and we're going to be here forever."

Palestinian unilateral statehood push would end Oslo

JTA

Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman warned that Israel would no longer be bound by past agreements if Palestinians ask the United Nations for recognition.

Catherine Ashton, left, and Avigdor Lieberman.

"The unilateral move at the UN is the end of the Oslo Accords and would be a violation of all agreements that we have signed until now," Lieberman said, according to Ha'aretz. "Israel would not be obligated to the agreements that it has signed with the Palestinians over the past 18 years."

Lieberman made his comments during a meeting in Jerusalem with the European Union's top foreign affairs official, Catherine Ashton. He said that Israel is willing to resume negotiations but that this will not happen because Palestinian Authority President Mamoud Abbas prefers confrontation to an agreement.

In a statement, a spokesperson for Ashton stressed the urgency of negotiations to achieve peace.

"We are well aware that September is fast approaching," the statement said, according to the Jerusalem Post. "With the events of the Arab Spring and following President [Barack] Obama's speech, it is more urgent than ever to engage in meaningful negotiations and move the Peace Process forward."

Ashton was scheduled to meet with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Sunday.

Ex-Argentine president exposes junta's antisemitic past

Alex Wexler
JTA

NEW YORK (JTA) — More than 30 years after he was kidnapped and tortured by secret police in Buenos Aires, Argentine banker Eduardo Saiegh has an unlikely partner in his fight to convict former government leaders on charges of antisemitic discrimination and state terrorism: the government itself.

Last month, Eduardo Duhalde, Argentina's secretary of human rights and a former president, joined Saiegh, who is Jewish, as a co-complainant in the case. That puts a member of the country's current government on the side of an investigation of its former leaders, including an ex-finance minister and a head of Argentina's Central Bank, on charges of crimes against humanity.

It all stems from the events surrounding eight days in the fall of 1980 when Saiegh, the owner of a major bank in Argentina, was detained by police and allegedly tortured and encouraged to sign away the rights to his bank. Eventually he did.

Just two days later, Argentina's Central Bank transferred $7 million in airline shares from Saiegh's bank, according to Morton Rosenthal, the former director of the Anti-Defamation League's Latin American Affairs department, who has been working on the case since the early 1990s.

Many viewed the incident as part of a campaign by government officials to oust Jews from the country's major banks. Until Duhalde joined Saiegh's campaign, however, that fact was never acknowledged publicly by Argentina's government.

It represents a significant milestone in the government's recognition of its antisemitic past, Rosenthal said.

"His complaint is now their complaint," Rosenthal said of the government. "They called for the arrest of these people."

Though the financial deal, which occurred during the military junta that ruled Argentina from 1976 to 1983, led to the prosecution of some members of the army, the non-military personnel who served as the plan's architects were never fully brought to task, according to Rosenthal.

Saiegh's campaign aims to change that.

"The civilians, who were major beneficiaries, enjoyed immunity from prosecution," Rosenthal said. "The government is taking actions to lift this immunity, even though 30 years have passed."

Saiegh says he has not forgotten the horrors of his week in captivity or the silent promise he made himself in the fall of 1980. "It was a Friday night. I was free, and I vowed to myself that I will fight the rest of my life to repair this situation," he recalled. "I believed it was very, very deep moral pain. The moral pain is worse than the physical pain because the physical pain passes after time."

Saiegh says he has no doubts why he was targeted. "It happened because I am Jewish. If it were from the traditional economic establishment," he said, it never would have happened.

The transparent day of reckoning provided by a public trial would teach Argentine antisemites and lawbreakers that there are consequences for criminal action, Saiegh says.

More important, he adds, a legal victory – with the government itself as a co-complainant – would serve as a rebuke to the notion that judges and prosecutors can be bought in Argentina.

"They bought justice in every situation possible," he said. "With the money they buy impunity. What will be the future of this country if that continues?"

Eduardo Duhalde

Justice in Argentina often is not easily achieved.

In the case of the country's most notorious tragedy involving Jews, the 1994 bombing in Buenos Aires of the AMIA Jewish community centre, which killed 85, the investigation has been marred by delays and prosecutorial misconduct. The perpetrators of the bombing have never been arrested, though Iranian officials have been implicated in the attack.

The bombing's Argentine suspects, many of them members of the Buenos Aires Police Department, were cleared of all charges in September 2004. One year later, the judge heading up the case was impeached on charges of serious mishandling of the investigation.

Saiegh, too, has faced significant challenges in his crusade. Over the past three decades he has seen some small victories, but nothing on the scale of the endorsement by Duhalde, the former president.

In 1999, the political umbrella organization of Argentina's Jewish community, known by the acronym DAIA, took Saiegh's case to a judge in Spain. The judge, Baltasar Garzon, came out strongly against the Central Bank's actions, noting that "the violent action against the Jewish community in Argentina during the military dictatorship was something planned beforehand and institutionalized."

However, Garzon's findings were not recognized in Argentina.

In 2004, Duhalde wrote a letter in which he acknowledged that the facts of Saiegh's case matched a pattern of state terrorism and unlawful appropriation of property against the country's Jewish community.

Rosenthal says it was an important turning point because it enabled Saiegh to begin pursuing a criminal complaint as opposed to simply working within the confines of the civil system – an action he filed in 2009.

Once a judge formally accepts Duhalde's decision to formally join Saiegh's suit as a co-complainant, they will have the ability to call witnesses, launch a full investigation and ultimately proceed to trial.

Pursuing his case is still a risky endeavor, Saiegh says; he has had round-the-clock police protection since filing the 2009 suit. But to hear the banker tell it, there's something more important at play here than his own safety: the future of the Argentine Jewish community.

"With discrimination, you can't make a country. You need integration," Saiegh said. "That's something we need change for the Jews in Argentina."

Scottish municipality votes down motion ripping Israel

JTA

A Scottish municipality voted down a motion comparing Israel's treatment of the Palestinians to apartheid.

The Dundee City Council at its regular monthly meeting Tuesday did, however, note with concern the "ongoing situation in Israel/Palestine" and called for "a just and lasting two-state solution, which will bring peace to the region".

Liberal Democrat Councilman Fraser Macpherson had submitted a motion condemning the Israeli government for "its continuing illegal occupation of East Jerusalem and the West Bank and the illegal blockade of Gaza." Macpherson told the Courier newspaper that he had planned to include a call for a boycott of Israeli goods and services but left out that section after receiving legal advice. The city council commended efforts made by U.S. President Barack Obama and others to promote peace in the region and called on the UK government to show leadership, according to a statement.

"It was accepted that Israelis have the right to live in peace, but the council deeply regrets the disproportionate response of the Israeli military against aid convoys and Palestinian protesters which has led to unnecessary suffering, lasting bitterness and international condemnation," the statement said.

The council also asserted "there has never been a ban on buying or lending books by Israeli authors in libraries in Dundee."

The vote comes less than a month after the West Dunbartonshire Council, consisting of towns and villages west of Glasgow, ordered new books by Israeli authors to be banned from the council's libraries.

The ban in West Dunbartonshire followed a decision made 2 1/2 years ago following the Gaza war to boycott goods produced in Israel. According to that law, the council and all its public bodies are forbidden to sell goods that originated from Israel.

Assad promises reforms

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Syrian President Bashar Assad said Monday that a national dialogue would begin soon, promising parliamentary elections in August and a complete reform package by September, in a speech responding to three months of protests against his rule.

In a televised address at Damascus University, Assad also warned that in listening to calls for reforms, the government must distinguish between people with legitimate needs and "saboteurs".

Assad called on all refugees to return to their homes, and guaranteed their safety, saying that the "army is meant to protect the citizens."

Bashar Assad

He promised to ask the Justice Ministry to mull expanding the recent amnesty he had extended to political prisoners, and said that 64,000 people have been wanted by Syrian authorities, some of which, he claimed, have handed themselves in.

Assad stressed that the Syrian government has already started implementing reforms, saying examples are the laws he had passed for the right of peaceful protest and his lifting of the state of emergency. He said parliamentary elections are due to take place in August, and that a reform package should be complete by September.

He mentioned the recent attack on the northwestern town of Jisr al-Shughour, calling protesters "gunmen with sophisticated weapons and communications" who had carried out a "massacre" in the city.

Despite brutal suppression by Assad's regime, hundreds of thousands of Syrians have taken to the streets in the past three months to demand greater democracy and civil liberties. Human rights groups have said more than 1,300 civilians have been killed in the unrest.

The latest crackdowns came on the weekend in northwestern Syria when government forces besieged several towns. Tanks and machine guns were sent in Saturday to stop anti-government rallies in Bdama near the Turkish border, opposition groups said. Army forces fired randomly at houses and besieged the town, injuring at least 20 people, they said.

The incident was part of operations against government opponents and deserters in Idlib province, which have seen more than 10,500 people, including 5,300 children, flee to Turkey in the past 10 days, Turkey's Anadolu news agency said Sunday.

The Turkish government has allocated about $2.3 million to care for the refugees living in four tent cities. Human rights activists said they fear the besiegement of Bdama could cut off a route for Syrians seeking to flee into Turkey.

A senior Turkish official warned Monday that Syrian President Bashar Assad has less than a week to start implementing long-promised political reforms demanded by Syrian protesters before foreign intervention begins.

Turkey, Syria's biggest neighbour and main trading partner, has been trying to persuade Assad to halt a military crackdown on demonstrations that have killed more than 1,300 civilians and forced thousands to take refuge across the border in Turkey.

Several European countries have submitted a draft resolution to the UN Security Council to condemn Syria's crackdown on protesters. Russian President Dmitry Medvedev has indicated he would not support such a resolution.

Syrian authorities blame the violence on armed groups and Islamists, backed by foreign powers. Syria has barred most international journalists from entering the country, making it difficult to verify accounts from activists and officials.

Israel Briefs

Olmert denies taking cash

Former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in testimony at his corruption trial denied accepting envelopes full of cash from American businessman Morris Talansky. Olmert said that Talansky's testimony was made up of "fantasies," and that no cash was involved in Talansky's campaign contributions and personal donations. He also said the suggestions that Talansky lent him money were false. Talansky allegedly gave Olmert envelopes containing thousands of dollars in cash over a period of several years. Talansky testified that Olmert would only accept cash donations. Making his first comments on the Talansky case in court, Olmert said he received money from Talansky in the form of political donations for his campaign, refunds for hotel expenses when he spoke at events organized by Talansky and $40,000 for legal expenses in 1996. Olmert is on trial in three cases: for allegedly paying for family vacations by double billing Jewish organizations through the Rishon Tours travel agency; for allegedly accepting envelopes full of cash from Talansky; and for allegedly granting personal favours to attorney Uri Messer when he served as trade minister in the Investment Center case. Olmert is the first former Israeli prime minister to stand trial. He resigned as prime minister in September.

Mavi Marmara not sailing

The Turkish ship that was the scene of bloodshed during a 2010 Israeli raid will not be sailing in a planned flotilla to Gaza. The Mavi Marmara will not participate in the flotilla aimed at breaking Israel's sea blockade of the Hamas-controlled territory. IHH, the Turkish Islamic charity behind the flotilla effort, said in a Friday news conference that the ship did not gain necessary approval from Turkish port authorities for technical reasons. On May 31, 2010, nine Turks were killed aboard the Mavi Marmara when violence broke out as Israeli commandos raided the ship during the first Gaza-bound flotilla. The new flotilla is scheduled to set out for Gaza on June 25.

Explosion kills 3 in Netanya

A suspected gas tank explosion in the Israeli coastal city of Netanya killed three people and injured 49 others. The explosion in the four-storey building, which occurred shortly after midnight early Friday morning, damaged surrounding structures. The three killed were a woman in her 20s and two women in their 40s, according to the Jerusalem Post. A police spokesperson said that the blast was not a terrorism attack, the Post reported.

House allocates record funds to anti-missile programs

Compiled by CJN staff

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In what is being touted as a strong message to the United States' friends and enemies, the appropriations defence subcommittee of the U.S. House of Representatives allocated record funding for a joint U.S.-Israeli missile defence program.

The subcommittee last week appropriated $235.7 million (all figures US) for the coming year, bringing the cumulative total of federal outlays for U.S.-Israeli joint missile and rocket defence programs to more than $1 billion since 2007.

"Given America's significant budget challenges, every single dollar we are expending on behalf of the U.S. taxpayer must be given the highest level of scrutiny, including funds appropriated toward the defence of the United States and its allies. It is a mark of the importance of these jointly developed missile defence programs – Arrow 2, Arrow 3, and David's Sling – that they were all robustly funded by our subcommittee," said committee member Steve Rothman, a New Jersey Democrat.

"The growing proliferation and increasing deadliness of missiles and rockets around the world – including those possessed by dangerous regimes such as the one headed by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Iran, Hezbollah in Lebanon, Hamas in Gaza, and President Bashar al-Assad in Syria – pose a direct threat to U.S. national security," said Rothman.

"Funding these new technologies serves our interests in the volatile Middle East, and wherever America's troops and citizens are stationed. This allocation helps fulfil the most important role of the U.S. House of Representatives: keeping America and her citizens safe."

Commenting on the announcement, the Politico.com website said, "The joint missile defence program is a strategic bulwark against Iranian nuclear ambitions and a sign that the military alliance between the United States and Israel remains strong, even as the two countries have had diplomatic disagreements over peace negotiations and U.S. policies toward the region."

Quoting a Hill Democrat, Politico reported that the Obama administration has signalled support for the program.

David's Sling is a military system being jointly developed by the Israeli defence contractor Rafael Advanced Defence Systems and American defence contractor Raytheon, designed to intercept medium- to long-range rockets and slower-flying cruise missiles, fired at ranges from 40 to 300 kilometres.

The Arrow missile systems are designed to shoot down longer range ballistic missiles.

IMF rejects Fischer over age

Moti Bassok
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Bank of Israel Governor Stanley Fischer was ruled out as a candidate to head the International Monetary Fund last week. The IMF board declined to change rules requiring that the managing director be younger than 65 on taking office. Fischer is 67.

"I have no regrets for having submitted my candidacy," Fischer stated following his disqualification. "I will proudly and happily continue in my role as governor of the Bank of Israel."

The IMF acted as expected in declining to change the age restriction. So why would Fischer submit his candidacy just ahead of the deadline, knowing his chances were slim because of his age and because the head of the IMF is usually a European?

He was likely encouraged to do so by very senior American associates who saw potential problems inherent in the other candidates, French Economic Affairs Minister Christine Lagarde and Mexican central banker, Agustin Carstens.

Fischer is known for his cautious, smart and sophisticated nature. People who know him well think he saw his candidacy as a win-win situation.

When Fischer announced he was competing for the IMF post, he was in effect telling Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and the leaders of the world's developed economies, that he was through as governor of the Bank of Israel. From now on, he would be available as a candidate for other leading international economic positions. If he got the IMF job, so much the better. If not, he would continue to serve as Bank of Israel governor until he got an interesting offer.

In about a year, Robert Zoellick, the American Republican, will conclude his term as president of the World Bank. That job carries no age restrictions and Fischer had been mentioned for the post in 2007.

Within the coming year, U.S. President Barack Obama will decide on a candidate for the next World Bank president. While the post of IMF chief has traditionally been reserved for a European, the World Bank presidency is reserved for an American. Fischer has American citizenship and he could be considered America's candidate, not Israel's.

Natasha author follows up with another winner

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

David Bezmozgis, the Toronto-based author whose 2004 collection Natasha and Other Stories bedazzled international literary critics, has written a first novel, The Free World (HarperCollins), that is certain to reinforce his reputation as a top-rate writer.

Bezmozgis, who is still young enough to be included in The New Yorker's list of 20 best writers under 40, emigrated from Latvia to Toronto with his parents as a child in 1979, an experience he revisits in The Free World. Set in 1978, the novel focuses on three generations of the Krasnansky family, who together travel from Riga to Rome, where they subsist in a bureaucratic purgatory as a panoply of consular officials determine whether their final destination will be Canada, United States, Australia, Israel or some other country.

Samuil, the family patriarch, is a die-hard Communist of the old school, fiercely anti-Zionist and highly resistant to his daughter-in-law Rosa's wish that they go to Israel, where she has relatives. Samuil's wife, Emma, cries when her cousin in Chicago informs her by telephone that she can no longer sponsor the family in America as previously promised. The news comes as a bitter betrayal. Where, in all of this free world, are the Krasnanskys to go?

Their eldest son, Karl, who with Rosa has two young children, is a responsible family man with a solid capitalist ethic, but so desirous of getting ahead that he falls in with a gang of roughshod underworld types in a shadowy venture.

The younger son, the charmer Alec, who is the novel's pivotal character, has resisted all ideological leanings: he is indifferent to both communism and capitalism, and is neither a Zionist nor an anti-Zionist. Women are his main preoccupation. As his wife, Polina, knows only too well, he is an inveterate ladies man.

While the novel is framed within the six months the family spends in Rome, multiple flashbacks supply vital details about Samuil's, Alec's and Polina's former lives in Russia. Bezmozgis is an adept storyteller with a keen eye for the dramatic and a trademark ability to withhold just enough information to keep up the suspense and keep the writing interesting.

The book, reminiscent of a 19th-century Russian novel, begins on a train: the first chapter has the two Krasnansky brothers loading piles of luggage into a passenger compartment through the windows. The suitcases are filled with Russian goods – "linens, toys, samovars, ballet shoes, nesting dolls, leather Latvian handicrafts, nylon stockings, lacquer boxes, pocketknives, camera equipment, picture books and opera glasses" – destined for "the bazaars of Rome." The streetwise Krasnanskys know the ropes, know they will need more than the pittance the "Joint" will give them if they are to subsist for a bleak and indeterminate interval in Rome.

In title and story, The Free World is deeply and wryly ironic. At odds with each other, the characters float in a difficult, transient world in which misery of one sort or another is a given, and things are often so bad that they can only be laughed at. It is an archetypically Russian world in which the players cheat on their wives, engage in criminal schemes, feed false "refugee persecution stories" to American consular officials, and otherwise subvert the system in order to get ahead. Following in the tradition of I. B. Singer, Bezmozgis paints an illicit Jewish underworld with economy and panache.

As he so aptly demonstrated in Natasha and Other Stories, he is particularly good with character and dialogue, infusing both with a thickly authentic Russian sensibility that hints at both tragedy and comedy. His savoury language likely owes much to the many phrases and idioms he has borrowed from the Russian.

The Free World updates the century-old subgenre of the Jewish immigrant novel to reflect modern times – a task its author seems almost uniquely positioned to accomplish. A previous generation of Jewish writers such as Abraham Cahan, Henry Roth and Anzia Yezierska, wrote about the mass migration of Jews to America between roughly 1900 and 1930. Bezmozgis is one of the first Jewish writers to chronicle the postwar exodus of Jews from the Soviet Union in the '70s, '80s and '90s.

From a historical standpoint, it's clear that he took great pains to get it right. For story research, he interviewed many ex-Soviet Russian-Jewish family friends and spent months in Rome and neighbouring Ladispoli, getting a sense of street geography. His realistic style ensured the book would be laden with sufficient accurate detail to give readers a true flavour of the immigrant experience.

"I wanted to get it right to the best of my ability," he told an interviewer for The Paris Review. "As I was writing it, I had the feeling and the belief that I was writing down the history of Soviet Jews in a way that I don't think anyone has done in English and I don't know that anyone would hazard to do. It was a strange missionary feeling."

Artistically, Bezmozgis avoids all of the usual pratfalls of first-time novelists, and it is clear that he possesses a rare gift. He has poured an immense amount of character, history, scenery, texture and experience into the novel. However, some readers may observe that The Free World contains too much backstory and description, and not enough forward momentum. Indeed, not until the so-called "third act" does the slowly rising action coalesce into anything approaching a fitting climax and denouement.

The rising action concerns an affair of Alec's that bubbles over into considerable trouble for him; the situation seems reminiscent of Natasha. But how does the end of this affair wrap up the business of the novel? In short, it doesn't, and the reader is left with the sense that the Krasnanskys' sense of alienation, dislocation and exile will continue into the future, no matter where they eventually settle.

Klezmer-infused children's play on at FringeKids

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Mazel and Shlimazel, the classic children's folk tale by Isaac Bashevis Singer, is getting the stage treatment at the 2011 Toronto Fringe Festival, as part of the FringeKids schedule.

It's also getting klezmerized.

Toronto drummer and composer Lorie Wolf has adapted Singer's story into a one-man children's theatre show, accompanied by a live four-piece klezmer ensemble, which she will lead.

Lorie Wolf

Her play is titled The Adventures of Mazel and Schlimazel.

The story follows a year in the life of Tam, a peasant boy, who unknowingly becomes the centrepiece in a wager between Mazel, the spirit of good luck, and his nemesis, Shlimazel, the bad-luck spirit.

Tam will receive a year of good fortune from the benevolent Mazel, and at year's end, Shlimazel will get a moment to undo all the luck conferred upon the spirits' pawn.

Who wins? Let your children find out at this 50-minute play.

Wolf, who last year recorded an album of klezmer music based on the book's themes, said she decided to write the play as a "Yiddish-themed experience" for children.

"It's set in a shtetl, a Yiddish setting, and there are lots of Yiddish words... I hope this will become an introduction to Yiddish culture for both parents and children," she said.

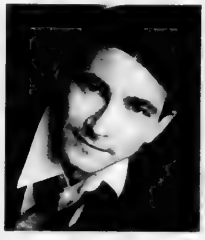
Additionally, Wolf said she takes any chance she gets to expose more people to klezmer music.

She said it's the musical component to the stage adaptation that should really make the show special.

"I hope to capture the sense of the story within the music, and there's a very good relationship between the music and the script," Wolf said.

Being that it's a one-man show, the burden of bringing all the characters – there are six in total – to life falls to veteran Fringe actor Geoff Kolomayz.

Kolomayz, who's not Jewish, said the story brings together the universal theme of good versus evil.



Geoff Kolomayz

He's also enjoying learning all the Yiddish terminology in the story, he said.

Kolomayz said he welcomes the opportunity to perform in front of kids and believes they'll come away with some life lessons.

"I enjoy children's theatre. They're always a truthful audience," he said, adding that there will be some "good humour" in the show as well.

Wolf and Kolomayz said the show will also involve some audience participation in the form of various "call-and-answer" segments with the crowd. The play is geared for ages five and up, according to Wolf.

"Different age groups will take away different things from the play," she said.

The Adventures of Mazel and Schlimazel opens at the Fringe Festival on July 8 at the Palmerston Library Theatre, 560 Palmerston Ave., and runs to July 17. It's being co-presented by the Ashkenaz Foundation. For more information and showtimes, visit www.fringetoronto.com or call 416-966-1062.

Tribute band keeps legend of Moe Koffman alive

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Ten years after the death of Toronto jazz legend Moe Koffman, his music still lives on in a tribute band led by pianist Bernie Senensky.

The Moe Koffman Tribute Band was formed shortly after the saxophonist/flutist's death at 72 for a concert at the Ontario Science Centre in Toronto, which coincided with the posthumous release of a live CD, Moe Koffman Quintet Live at the Ontario Science Centre.

"The basis of this band is to recreate a Moe Koffman Quintet concert," says Senensky, a Winnipeg native who's now based in Toronto. "We do the exact same arrangements and compositions that were played by Moe Koffman and the quintet. It was a very popular group. Moe had a huge following of fans. It was said that it was the No. 1 small jazz group in Canada at that time."

Senensky was a member of Koffman's quintet for 20 years. "While I was with the band, we did countless tours to different countries across the States and Canada, Europe, Australia and Brazil. A lot of those concerts involved a special guest – trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie."

The Moe Koffman Tribute Band, a sextet, consists of Senensky, and fellow Koffman alumnus Barry Elms on drums and Neil Swainson on bass, along with Bill McBirnie on flute, Darryl Orr on saxophone and Reg Schwager on guitar.

"I put together all the charts and the tunes with the help of Giselle, Moe's wife," Senensky says. "She was so kind to give me the actual arrangements that were in the band's repertoire. So, I decided to keep the band going."

Senensky says that Koffman's repertoire was unique for its time because it involved many of his interpretations of classical themes from composers such as Bach and Vivaldi. The tribute band also plays original Koffman material, including the saxophonist's international hit, Swinging Shepherd Blues.

Bernie Senensky

To commemorate the 10-year anniversary of Koffman's death, the tribute band is performing several shows this year, including a free concert at Toronto's Metro Square, on June 26 as part of the TD Toronto Jazz Festival. This will be followed by a workshop on the history of Toronto's jazz.

The first concert of this anniversary was at the China House in Toronto, attended by the Koffman family, including his musician sons, Larry and Herbie, and Herbie's musical sons, Josh and Jake, who joined the tribute band onstage. In May, Jazz FM91 recorded the Moe Koffman Tribute Band in concert at the Old Mill in Toronto for future broadcast.

After the Metro Square concert, Senensky will take part in a workshop at the HMV store in Metro Square, which will include an interview about jazz in Toronto and specifically about Koffman, conducted by the festival's former artistic director, musician Jimmy Galloway.

"It is important to understand the history of jazz in Toronto and know that they are carrying on the tradition," Senensky says. In Canada, young jazz musicians think of the jazz mecca as New York, which of course it is, but there were definitely very important things that happened in Toronto also.

"The fact that the Moe Koffman Quintet was based here and played all over the world and had lots of recordings, tours and was recognized internationally should be very interesting to the people coming to the workshop."

Senensky is a much sought-after jazz frontman and composer in his own right and won a SOCAN (Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada) Award for one of his compositions. He has also played with many jazz greats, including Chet Baker, Terence Blanchard, Randy Brecker, Buddy DeFranco, Herb Ellis, Sonny Greenwich, Herbie Mann and Zoot Sims, and in piano duets with Oscar Peterson and Marian McPartland.

Senensky has released 12 albums of his own, three of which have received Juno nominations. He is about to release two more CDs – one as a piano trio featuring bassist Gene Perla and Ben Riley on drums. Riley and Senensky both play in the group Bowfire. The other album, with Senensky playing Hammond B3 organ, includes Nathan Hiltz on guitar and Sly Juhas on drums. The trio plays as the Nathan Hiltz Trio every Sunday at Joe Mamas in the Entertainment District.

Senensky plays every Thursday to Saturday at the Azure Restaurant at the Inter-Continental Hotel on Front Street with the Dan Bodanis Trio, with drummer Bodanis and Steve Wallace on bass.

Presented by the TD Toronto Jazz Festival, Bernie Senensky and his Moe Koffman Tribute Band play a free noon concert at Metro Square, 221 King St. W., on June 26. The Downtown Toronto Jazz Festival (www.torontojazz.com) runs June 24 to July 3.

The band is also performing at the Sun Life Financial Uptown Waterloo Festival (www.uptownwaterloojazz.ca) on July 16 at 4:30 p.m.

Road trip to Cup final a memorable experience

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Living in Toronto, you don't often get to see the Stanley Cup final live – maybe once in a generation if you're lucky. Hockey in June is a TV event, but during a recent trip to Vancouver I was privileged to attend Game 5 between the Canucks and the Bruins.

Before sharing my experience, let me make one thing clear: I didn't travel to Vancouver with the intention of going to the game. I was in the West Coast city as a hanger-on, the "guest" of my talented and lovely wife, Sharron, who was participating in a junket arranged by her employer. She, like dozens of others from 17 countries, was being thanked for a very successful year in 2010.

From the moment we arrived in Vancouver, we could see the city was gripped by Cup fever. Staff at the downtown hotel where we stayed wore Canucks T-shirts, stores had Canucks towels and sweaters prominently displayed in the windows and media coverage of the playoffs was everywhere.

Even the many foreigners in our group got into the spirit. Visitors from India and Mexico, who likely never before witnessed a good old fashioned hockey "face wash," were buzzing about the Aaron Rome hit on Bruins' forward Nathan Horton. "That hit was clearly late," I could have sworn that fellow from Bangalore said with some authority.

With Vancouver up 2-0 at the time, talk in the town was for a big celebration on Friday, if, as was being anticipated, the team split in Boston and won Game 5 on home ice. But then the bad news started to trickle in during our arduous schedule of cocktails and fine dining. We heard over Bloody Caesars that the Canucks had failed to show up in Game 3 and were thoroughly embarrassed, 8-1. Bloody awful.

No worries, however. Everyone expected Boston to put up a good fight. The plan for a Game 5 celebration was still in play.

But Game 4 proved a major wake-up call. Our booze cruise was interrupted by news that the Canucks were down 1-0. Then more bad news filtered in – the bar was out of vodka. Oh, and the Canucks had lost 4-0.

At this point, things began to look serious. Is gin a substitute for vodka? And what about Game 5? No Stanley Cup parade now.

The mood in town likewise changed perceptibly. There is a feeling, my Vancouver-based friend told me, that the Canucks always come up short in the playoffs. They have a history of losing, even when they're the better team.

A little history. My friend and I go back a long way. We played intramural hockey in university wand, along with four other guys, were partners in three Winnipeg Jets season tickets.

So he knew I liked hockey. He had mentioned he was a Canucks season ticket holder (he shares seats, as do many in the West Coast city) and had scored tickets to Games 2 and 5. Then came an unexpected question: would I like to come with him to Game 5?

'What's the angle, she's gotta have an angle'

The offer caught me, well, off guard. How could I? I sputtered, my wife and I have plans, we're together without the kids, she's expecting me and... uh, what time does the game start?

"Five o'clock," he replied, adding some bitter remark about how the people in the west are just so thoroughly pleased to change their schedules and leave work early to accommodate the TV networks and those bast..., those lovely people, back east.

I pondered the timing: The game should be over by 8:00, barring overtime, then there's dinner, a few drinks. I could be back at the hotel by midnight, easy.

After consulting my wife – did I mention she's lovely and vivacious – I got the green light for a guilt-free outing at the ol' hockey barn. It's the chance of the lifetime, a golden opportunity, she said.

It is? I replied, a little perplexed by how easy things went. To quote Peter Falk from an old Frank Capra movie, "what's the angle, she's gotta have an angle."

But she didn't. Likewise, my friend's wife gladly ceded her ticket, and we are eternally grateful to the two of them. Did I mention they're fantastic and exquisite ladies?

The game itself was quite an experience, and I don't mean standing in a line 20 deep just to get to the men's washroom.

The rah-rah atmosphere, the hysteria, the nail-biting nervousness and the euphoria were like something scripted in Hollywood.

Even before, outside the Rogers Arena, the atmosphere was festive, resembling a tailgate party, with hundreds of fans milling about. There were games for kids, the chance to shoot on a cutout goaltender, scalpers selling tickets. BTW, tickets with a face value of around $400 were selling for $2,000.

Inside the rink, just about everyone was decked out in Canucks blue. Team towels were on every seat, ostensibly to wave over your head, though my buddy maintained they were to wipe away the sweat when the action got particularly nerve-wracking.

The game itself was fantastic. The Canucks are known for speed and finesse, which they demonstrated again and again. You've got to love a team that constantly pinches its defencemen, pressures the opponent and scores many beautiful goals.

On the other hand, the Canucks tended to overpass, sometimes giving up great opportunities in search of the highlight reel goal.

Though the score was 0-0 for much of the game, there were plenty of great chances. A memorable one later replayed over and over again was a flubbed shot by fourth line winger Tanner Glass. The TV cameras, shooting from the other side of the ice, didn't do justice to the dimensions of the wide open net that faced Glass. He completely fanned on the shot, at which point my friend turned to me and said, "even you could have scored that goal." To which I replied, "you mean, even you could have scored that goal."

Zero-zero going into the third and the tension was palpable. Then, early in the period, Maxim Lapierre, a relatively unheralded late season acquisition, took a banked pass from Kevin Bieksa, and beat Bruins goaltender Tim Thomas. The place went nuts.

The Canucks killed the rest of the period to take a 3-2 series lead. On the streets of Vancouver, thousands of revellers high-fived everyone in sight and partied like they had actually won the Cup.

"Isn't this a bit premature?" I mentioned to my friend as we tried to make our way through a sea of euphoric fans.

By the time you read this, we'll know if the Canucks exorcised old ghosts and played like the best team in the NHL, or if they screwed up yet again.

Regardless, the game was fantastic, a handy reminder about the kind of energy, enthusiasm and civic pride that a team can generate in a city, even one as beautiful as Vancouver that has so much going for it.

Oh, and by the way, the guy from Bangalore picked the Canucks in seven.

Bubbie entertains youngsters with audio book

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Marion Schwarz

In a children's world of Backyardigans, talking bunnies, turtles that go to school and bears that drive cars, what could be more natural than four little pigs that tell stories.

Especially when the critters are smart – piggy PhDs, practically – and can impart lessons of morality to children that last a lifetime.

Higgly, Wiggly, Wonkers & Snout, available as a CD or a digital download, is the creative output of Marion Schwarz, the bubbie from The Bubbie Break, a television program that ran from 1991 to 1997 on the Women's Television Network and across the United States

Dabbling in the latest in entertainment technology, the 85-year-old Schwarz recently released an audio book that contains "15 stories, and each has a different moral message."

The stories are the same ones she told her now grown-up children, and later her grandchildren and great-grandchildren. Test marketed before the only focus group that really matters – her family – the stories proved popular in each retelling, she said.

"I used to tell my grandchildren stories about four wonderful piglets, Higgly, Wiggly, Wonkers & Snout. I was encouraged by my family to write the stories down. I did and the next logical step was to make an audio book out of them."

Good children's books impart a moral message and Higgly is no different.

The audio book, which is available on iTunes and Amazon, "is filled with the essence of goodness," said her son, Alan, who is heavily involved in the project.

In one story, a spotted brown piglet is introduced to the sty, but the other piglets want nothing to do with the interloper. "They give it a hard time, make fun of the little piglet until Wonkers explains that it's not important what your skin colour is, only if you're a good piglet," said Marion.

In the end, the other piglets apologized to the brown piglet, "and they all became friends," she said.

Other important issues tackled by the philosopher pigs are about playing rough and avoiding the spread of hurtful gossip about others.

"The Higgly stories all feature a moral at the end," Schwarz stated. "I am glad that I was able to take country life and create stories that are entertaining and family friendly. For children who grew up in the inner city, my stories will give them something to dream about. I hope they will consider the piglets their friends."

Schwarz said she came up with the piglet stories many years ago when her late husband, Joe, brought four little porkers and a miniature donkey, Poncho, to the farm they owned in Bowmanville. She used to tell her kids stories about the pigs and those are the tales that formed the basis of the current audio book. She added music and wrote songs that are also part of the story book.

"I worked with an amazing producer, Mark Kersey, and we created a really great Higgly theme song. There are three versions of the song, so children can dance between stories. One of the versions is in [Mandarin]."

Back when her kids liked to visit the farm, they loved to play with Poncho, "the head honcho, because he was bright. When I sang to him, he brayed."

Those memories clearly still delight Schwarz. "I wanted to pass it on. It's a legacy, that no matter how old the kids got, they won't forget that bubbie sang to them and taught them right from wrong."

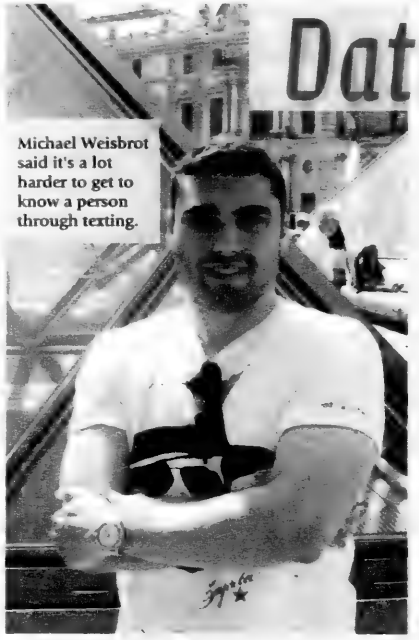
Dating in the 21st century



Michael Weisbrot said it's a lot harder to get to know a person through texting.

Below, professional matchmaker Alison Green said young people are finding it harder to develop meaningful relationships because they're not used to face-to-face communication.

Long gone are the days when a guy could simply pick up the telephone to ask a girl out on a date. The dating game has drastically changed over the last 10 years with the growth and sophistication of the Internet.

There are now unlimited options for dating and numerous tools to gain access to one's potential bashert, or soulmate. Facebook gives you a sneak peek of the person in consideration. Texting provides a quick and non-obtrusive way to flirt and kick-start the conversation, and there are also a multitude of online dating sites to peruse.

Sounds like fun, but the question still remains: is all this technology that permeates our lives a blessing or a curse?

There's no doubt that it's easier to meet people these days. Texting, rather than having a face-to-face conversation, is a more comfortable and less stressful way to communicate, giving texters more time to consider what they're about to say in their reply. Even if you're not the smoothest dude on the planet, your secret's safe until, that is, you actually meet face to face, which is really the point of dating, isn't it?

Michael Weisbrot, 23, a graduate student at University of Toronto, knows that although texting is the norm, he prefers having face-to-face conversations.

"There's more of a flow when you're talking to someone in person. Texting is a more lengthy process, and it is harder to get to know the person," Weisbrot said.

Shlomo Buzaglo, Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP) director of programs and trips, recognizes the significant impact that social media plays in the world of dating for millennials – the generation born from the mid-1970s to early 2000s. But there are also downsides.

"We are a generation about instant gratification – a lot of the times I feel this generation is non-committal. There's always something new and something better out there, and people try to hold back a little," Buzaglo said.

He believes that this "sitting on the fence" attitude is fine when you're just playing the field, but young people are having real trouble reading the cues when a relationship goes from fun to serious.

"Chatting over JDate, BBM or Facebook is no replacement for real face-to-face time," Buzaglo said.

He added that JUMP programs that help young Jewish adults connect with one another and the community is the best way to meet people. In fact, five couples who met through JUMP last year got hitched.

Hitch, the name of a program jointly run by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Community Connect and JUMP, is an ambitious initiative that specifically addresses the business of dating and finding a mate.

Federation's Community Connect networking initiatives manager, Shira Webber, one of the driving forces behind Hitch, firmly believes that help is needed because of the overwhelming options out there.

"Technology has changed the concept of relationships. Although the gizmos and gadgets have become essential in our daily lives, we've lost the whole ability to woo one another, and this takes away from the mysterious part of a relationship. Texting for weeks on end before anyone picks up the phone is not a romantic way to start a relationship."

Webber acknowledged that online dating is at the forefront of the modern dating scene, giving greater access to a larger pool of people, but cautioned that it's hard to determine if someone is really as great in person as they seem online. There's also a problem with trust and exclusivity in the current dating scene.

"When you meet someone online, how do you know they aren't dating 15 other people at the same time?" Webber said.

"There's also a risk factor out there because of the amount of people that you have access to meeting virtually, and it has made people more cautious about giving out their personal information. BBM is okay, but a telephone number is not."

One recent Hitch event, "No BS Dating in the 21st Century," featured modern-day professional matchmaker Alison Green, who gave some very practical dating advice to 65 women.

"Your bashert will not just fall in your lap. Practise talking over texting, and show up on your date with enthusiasm and optimism. It's social networking, too… Your date may not be a match for you, but someone they know may be," said Green, who has more than 12 years of matchmaking experience.

"Without realizing it, millennials are looking for perfection and instant gratification – two things that are antithetical to a healthy and vibrant relationship," Green added. "A significant issue today that is undermining efforts to find a meaningful relationship is a lack of ease to communicate face to face. Millennials find dating awkward and end up frustrated, starting over at square one again and again."

Green launched a Millennial Match division as part of her consulting services in response to the serious difficulties she saw that generation of daters were experiencing in their search for a soulmate.

Karen Feldman Haber, a social worker who said many people come into her practice seeking advice about dating, thinks that it will probably be another 10 years before we have a good idea of the impact technology has on the dating scene.

"For the shy person, technology allows for anonymity, which makes dating less daunting," she said. "For others, it can be frustrating and possibly anxiety provoking.

"However with every generation there are new challenges and new ways of approaching the dating scene and relationships," she added. "This generation benefits from limitless possibilities."

Family above money

Dear Ella,

My brother-in-law Mark, the lawyer, who eats in our home regularly, who visits our cottage with his family every summer, who claims to be closer to us than any other relative, charged my daughter a hefty amount when she used him to litigate a legal problem she was having at work.

Sandra was let go from her job after 12 years for reasons she felt were unjust, so she decided to sue her employer. She discussed the matter at our dinner table one night when Mark was over with his family.

Mark listened to her side and told her it sounded like she might have a case. He suggested that she call him at the firm on Monday morning. Sandra took him up on his offer. He took on the case, but they didn't discuss fees. We just assumed that he was doing this for free for his niece because he loves her and they are close.

Imagine our shock when she came to us in tears waving a huge bill. I was livid. My husband tried to calm us down, but I think it's outrageous that he has the chutzpah to charge Sandra that kind of money when it was his idea that she call him in the first place.

Should there not be some sense of family or loyalty? I would be interested to hear your opinion.

Disheartened

Dear Disheartened

You don't have to look too far to find a family or friendship which has been torn apart because of money.

Not every circumstance is the same. You mention that Mark said to call him at his firm. Does that mean he doesn't work alone? Does he have to answer to other partners? Are there legal assistants, disbursements, receptionists, rent and other overhead that he has to pay? How much time did he spend researching her case, writing letters, going to court or mediating on Sandra's behalf?

It's easy to say he shouldn't have charged her, but when you actually look at all that was involved, you might feel otherwise. Why should Sandra's problem cost Mark expenses? What I'm sure Sandra did get was special attention from an uncle who loves her and happens to be a competent lawyer.

Whenever a business transaction occurs between family members or close friends, everything should be out in the open right from the start. Whether it's something as small as the sale of a pair of pants to something as large as the sale of a house, fees, commissions, prices and work expected should be discussed by both parties, especially the one who is the recipient of the goods or services. Know what it's going to cost you. Never, ever assume! With all the cards on the table, you can make an informed decision and keep the relationship intact.

Before you write Mark out of your family completely, Sandra should ask him to explain exactly what he charged and why. Is it possible that he did give you a reasonable discount? Maybe with some understanding, you'll have a different opinion. If you're still unhappy, tell him. Talk it out, and then put it behind you. Family is more valuable than money.

More than skin deep

It wasn't my usual reason to be in a downtown Toronto hospital. This time, it was because I was an out-patient in a dermatology surgical clinic at Women's College Hospital. The experience taught me a few very important lessons.

It reminded me how lucky I am to have a universal, publicly funded health-care system to which all patients have access to without any real impediment. Although I was just shy of 70 years old, I was among younger people in the waiting room. It was clear from the various bandages I saw that most people were having surgical procedures on their faces or necks, which can be done safely and effectively on an out-patient basis.

Signing in was smooth and effortless. The referral had been made by my dermatologist, with the confirmation coming within an hour of his faxing the request. Although it was a few months hence, I was not worried, as I knew the lesion in the crease of my nose was very slow-growing. My being a doctor had nothing to do with the appointment being made for me, and I was happy in that knowledge, as I respect the intrinsic equity of access to the system.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

After I showed my health card, I waited until the nurse came to me, explained the procedure and prepared everything for the doctor. He, too, explained the procedure and performed the first part of it. After waiting to demonstrate that the "margins" of the tissue were clear, he told me that he had to establish that everything was clear, which was eventually achieved. He then showed me how he had to "fill" the space made by the surgical removal and did a finely planned and executed "plastic" repair.

It took a few days, some modest pain and a black eye before things began to recover, and a week later he removed the sutures and told me everything was "fine."

In addition to my relief, and delight with the health-care system, I saw, by the number of people that had been waiting for similar procedures, the relationship between sun exposure and the risk of developing skin lesions that might require invasive treatments.

I grew up literally on the beach in Brighton Beach, N.Y., made famous by Neil Simon's play Brighton Beach Memoirs. At that time, little was known about the dangers of excessive sun exposure, and the summer ritual of sunburn to suntan was practised by all of my contemporaries, even to the point of using oils and reflectors that would increase the impact of the sun's rays. Little did we know or appreciate how we would suffer during our mature years from the negative effects of this prolonged sun exposure, which range from cosmetically unattractive lesions to more serious ones, some of which can be lethal.

We know better now, and it is therefore incumbent on us who know the risks to let our peers know what kind of care they should take in the sun. And most importantly, we should impress on our children and grandchildren that the transitory attractiveness of a suntan can play havoc with one's skin in the long run, with damage ranging from increased wrinkling and premature aging to malignant skin lesions.

My experience in the clinic was more than skin deep – it went right to the core of our wonderful health-care system – and it reminded me of the steps that all of us should take to maintain and ensure good skin health.

A salute to our community and its volunteers

UJA Federation OF GREATER TORONTO

Volunteers make our community what it is

As the Chairs of UJA Federation's Campaign 2012, we are thrilled that through these pages we have the opportunity to pay tribute to our community's remarkable volunteers: the thousands of generous and caring men, women and children who roll up their sleeves to help make our community one of the strongest in the Diaspora.

Your contributions come in so many forms, including creating exciting events, canvassing donors, and spreading the word about the unique, vital and strategic work that UJA donations enable. After all, UJA Federation is our sole Jewish communal fund, serving a vast range of social, educational, and advocacy needs in Toronto, Israel and around the world. We are deeply thankful for, and inspired by the commitment and passion of everyone who has ever contributed their time, energy, and creativity to the Jewish community of Toronto.

In addition to encouraging others to donate generously to UJA's Annual Campaign, we encourage you to find a volunteer role where you, too, can contribute - you will be amazed at how fulfilling it will be.

We look forward to the Campaign ahead, and to meeting and working with all of the volunteers who will help make Campaign 2012 a success.

Appreciatively,

Becoming one of the leading Jewish communities in the Diaspora does not simply happen.

Jewish Toronto, which year after year, continues to grow and flourish, owes much of its success to its cadre of committed, knowledgeable, and selfless volunteers. They are truly the fuel that drives the UJA Federation engine and maintains the strength of so many incredible agencies here in Toronto, ensuring a strong and vibrant present and future for all of us.

Whether it's the hundreds of passionate annual campaign canvassers, those who take to the phones at a UJA Telethon, or those who take on the Herculean task of making our Walk with Israel the annual success that it is, our volunteers personify all that is so good about our community.

To not only bring our community together through a myriad of celebrations, rallies, and other important events throughout the year, but to make them run smoothly and seamless is a true talent, a talent supplied by the men, women and children of Jewish Toronto.

This annual Volunteer Recognition Supplement is our way of thanking each and every one of you for your ongoing commitment to tzedakah and tikkun olam, repairing the world; and for helping to make Jewish Toronto everything that it is today.

Thank you!

Sincerely,

Elizabeth Wolfe

Volunteerism is a privilege, not a burden

Rabbi Howard Morrison
President,
Toronto Board of Rabbis

The first detailed account of volunteerism is found in Parshat T'rumah, Exodus chapters 25-27. In preparation for building a Tabernacle, a spiritual communal centre for the Jewish people, God instructs Moses saying, "Tell the Israelite people to bring Me gifts; you shall accept gifts for Me from every person who is so moved." A contemporary commentary suggests, "This kind of giving, a free will offering, does not come through guilt, coercion, or competition, but from the deepest resources of the soul. The Israelites bring yarn, precious metals, cloth and tanned skins – an array of earthly objects that will eventually become the sacred space where Israel can seek God's presence. Today, it is important for all of us to continue to make freewill offerings to the institutions that unify the Jewish people. Along with tzedakah (required giving), t'rumah (voluntary giving) is vital for sustaining our community. Synagogues, Jewish centres, and Jewish communal agencies cannot survive on membership fees or dues alone. As they struggle to meet their financial needs, these institutions require our heartfelt support through the free will gifts that are necessary to fulfill the good and holy work of these organizations. When we bring our voluntary gifts of money, time, and other resources, we bring the realm of the holy into our lives."

Today we honour and show our appreciation to those who have voluntarily given of their money, time, and other resources for the benefit of the Jewish community. Those who have given of themselves voluntarily have done so as a privilege and not a burden. They have given cheerfully in a way that matters and which serves to refine our world. Like the T'rumah gift that was given some three-thousand years ago, it is a privilege to be involved in the sacred task of building a community in a way which reinforces our commitment to God, Torah, and Israel. Yasher Koach to all those whose voluntary efforts are being acknowledged and celebrated.

Students roll up their sleeves - and the coins - for UJA's Carmel Fire Fund

Bialik Hebrew Day School students come together for people of Carmel

By Dan Horowitz

On Thursday, December 2, 2010, the largest forest fire in Israel's history broke out, and, in the next 82 hours before being extinguished, the blaze claimed the lives of 41 people. When the smoke finally cleared, the fire had destroyed dozens of homes and thousands of acres of land.

With the onset of the fire, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto created its Carmel Fire Fund which saw our community raise over $280,000 from 1,500 donors.

While Jewish Toronto's residents once again answered the call when Israel was in need of our support, that generosity and compassion was personified by the students of Bialik Hebrew Day School.

Under the leadership of Vice Principal, Senior Division, Beverley Young and Student Council Advisor Oriane Falkenstein, and following one of the school's foundation pillars – Ahavat Yisrael, love for Israel – students ran a coin collection campaign to raise money for the people of the Carmel region. Every day during one week, students were asked to bring coins to school in the following denominations: Monday: Nickels - Tuesday: Dimes - Wednesday: Quarters Thursday: Loonies - Friday: Toonies

Student Council and Senior Division students visited classrooms daily, collecting the coins, and, when the final coin was collected, an impressive $3,300 was collected for Carmel.

"As soon as we heard about the fire in Israel, we knew we wanted to help," said Vice Principal Young. "Our Preschool Vice Principal Amy Platt suggested the idea of the Coin Collection Campaign, and we loved it. Before Shabbat on Friday, December 3, an email went to all Bialik families explaining the Coin Collection Campaign as a great tzedakah opportunity through which we could demonstrate our compassion for, and solidarity with Am Yisrael in their time of need. We are so grateful to our Bialik family, students, parents and staff for their generous response."

"It was an outstanding school-wide effort that demonstrated how even nickels and dimes can add up," said Falkenstein. "It also showed the power of cooperation and how much we could achieve by working together."

"Each day, we made a conscious decision and a deliberate attempt to bring in the coin of the day," explains Grade 8 student Julia Sebastien. "It was amazing to hear the public address announcements each afternoon telling us what the total for the day and the week was so far. It was exciting to hear the amounts doubling as coin values increased."

IsraAid volunteers, UJA Federation mobilize for the people of Japan

When Shachar Zahavi, founder of the humanitarian organization IsraAid, first heard about the earthquake and tsunami that devastated Japan in March, he knew that IsraAid could help. "We immediately called our contacts in the UN, Israeli government and international aid agencies and began evaluating what the needs on the ground were," said Zahavi.

While IsraAid mobilized a volunteer team consisting of emergency medicine, search and rescue and water purification experts, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the world's largest financial supporter of IsraAid, created the Japan Earthquake Relief Fund to ensure a successful IsraAid mission. The fund raised approximately $155,000 from almost 900 compassionate and generous donors.

"The Toronto Jewish community responded immediately to the enormous needs of Japan," says Zahavi. "As a result of the community's generosity, we dispatched our team to Japan and were one of the first emergency response units on the ground."

UJA Week fundraiser something to CHAT about

By Dan Horowitz

There was something appropriate about students from TanenbaumCHAT at the Kimel Family Education Centre on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus using their talents to raise funds for United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2011.

After all, one of the main goals of the campaign was to answer the unique challenges facing Jewish life today by preparing our next generation with the tools and knowledge they need to live full, satisfying Jewish lives.

Wanting to contribute to that campaign, TanenbaumCHAT students held UJA Week from November 1 to 5, led by a committee of students comprised of Eliana Goldberg, Ariela Gutfrajnd, Orli Bogler, Haley Borenstein and Ayala Lesser.

Whether it was the Grade 12 Auction, which saw those "bought" buy their new owners lunch, or help them with their homework, or the Pie-in-the-Face competition, where students paid for the unique and undoubtedly satisfying experience of heaving the baked goods into the face of their beloved teacher, UJA Week was an unqualified success, raising $1,300 towards UJA's Campaign 2011.

UJA Week Committee Heads and Junior Heads (l to r): Ayala Lesser, Grade 11; Haley Borenstein, Grade 10; Orli Bogler, Grade 11; Ariela Gutfrajnd, Grade 12; and Eliana Goldberg, Grade 12, prepare for the student favourite, pie-in-the-face fundraiser where students pay to "pie" their teachers in the face.

"UJA Week, like most fundraisers, is really about more than just raising money," said 12th Grader, Goldberg. "They're also about raising awareness and getting the whole school involved as one team. We always enjoy coming together for the good of the community and to support important causes such as United Jewish Appeal."

"I was really happy with the way UJA Week turned out this year," said Gutfrajnd, also in the 12th Grade. "My favourite part was witnessing, first-hand, the incredible sense of camaraderie, spirit and excitement that both the students and teachers demonstrated throughout the entire week. It's amazing how as a school, we can raise money for such an important cause while, at the same time, fill the school with such positive energy and wonderful spirit!"

The sweet sounds of tzedakah

By Monique Gottlieb

Orli Silverberg is extremely passionate about two things: playing the violin, and making the world a better place. In honour of her bat mitzvah, she decided to combine the two by organizing a violin concert to raise money for children living in Sderot, Israel, with the help of the B'nai Tzedek Teen Philanthropy program at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

Before her bat mitzvah, Orli knew she wanted to raise money for a charitable cause. "I know I'm very lucky," explained Orli. "I live in a safe country, and I have everything I need. Other people aren't as fortunate as me, so I wanted to do what I could to help them."

Toronto's Orli Silverberg organized a violin concert to raise money for children living in Sderot, Israel, with the help of the B'nai Tzedek Teen Philanthropy program at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

Orli had always felt a strong connection to Israel. Her mother is Israeli, and her family visits the country at least once a year. When she was in Israel this past summer, her family visited Sderot. Seeing the city and its citizens for herself made a huge impact on Orli. "I think they are so brave to live there. I was really scared when I was there for just one day, and they live there every day of their lives."

After researching various causes, she decided to raise money for the people of Sderot. "I felt like they needed the money the most, out of everything I looked at," explained Orli.

Sderot, located on the border of the Gaza Strip, has been the scene of kassam rocket attacks for over eight years. Its citizens live in constant fear, yet most of them choose to stay there to stand their ground on Israel's behalf.

Back in Toronto, the Silverbergs sent out invitations to their family and friends, inviting them to their home for the concert while asking for a donation to go towards the people of Sderot. With her decade of experience playing the violin, and the help of her little sister, Orli put on a phenomenal show. She and her family were blown away by the generosity of the 80 loved ones who came out to support the cause and collectively contributed $5,000.

Through B'nai Tzedek, Orli is able to decide where her donations will go – in this case, helping Sderot's children.

Raising money for Sderot made Orli feel more connected to the people living there. Now that she has had a taste of how it feels to give, Orli is addicted. A lot of people contributed, and she realized that she has so much potential to do good in the world, even at such a young age. "Getting involved and giving to charity is such a great thing. Before I actually did it, I had no idea how good it would make me feel. Instead of people buying gifts for me, I am helping people who are really less fortunate. It feels amazing."

500 Toronto Teens join 10,000 more in a day of tzedakah

By Dan Horowitz

More than 500 Toronto-area teens rolled up their sleeves and joined forces with 10,000 other Jewish teens from across North America, Europe and Israel on April 10th, as part of J-Serve, the Global Day of Jewish Youth Service.

2011 marks the second year in which Jewish teens from across the Greater Toronto Area had the chance to participate in this international initiative, thanks to funding by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the PANIM Institute of BBYO. J-Serve Toronto coincided with the kickoff of Volunteer Canada's National Volunteer Week, our country's largest celebration of volunteers, volunteerism, and civic participation.

J-Serve Toronto 2011 is presented by BBYO, in partnership with B'nai Tzedek Teen Philanthropy, an initiative of UJA Federation's Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, B'nei Akiva, Canadian Young Judea, Chabad Youth Network, GROW, Habonim Dror, Hashomer Hatzair, Jewish Student Union, NCSY, Tzofim and United Synagogue Youth.

For Toronto's Sam Strelshik, 17, the Co-Chair of The Jewish Foundation's B'nai Tzedek program, and a member of the J-Serve organizing committee, the day was everything it was meant to be.

"Whether it was cleaning for Passover at the Anshei Minsk Synagogue, visiting patients at Baycrest, selling pins for the Canadian Cancer Society's annual daffodil month, or spearheading a transformative cleanup of Earl Bales Park for the City of Toronto, J-Serve brought together a diverse and committed group of Jewish teens for one common purpose, bettering our community," said Strelshik. "They've all heard about the concepts of Jewish values such as gemilut chasidim (acts of loving kindness), but on this day, they all learned firsthand the importance of tzedakah and tikkun olam, our responsibility to repair the world. No longer are they just words, they're a part of their lives."

Pictured are some of the more than two dozen J-Serve Ambassadors who lead J-Serve recruitment efforts among their peers and within their schools and youth groups.

"It was so incredibly fulfilling and satisfying to serve on the J-Serve organizing committee, with so many other dedicated, enthusiastic, young volunteers," said Orli Matlow, Co-Chair, along with Sam, of The Jewish Foundation's B'nai Tzedek program. "To see so many young people giving up their free time simply to help others is such a positive sign for our entire community. Many of these volunteers will, hopefully, continue to personify and practice the values of tzedakah and tikkun olam as adults, and that is so encouraging for the future of our Jewish community."

The Toronto initiative was just one of over 100 events internationally, where teens participated in a variety of different projects.

Volunteer Excellence: The Community Honours Its Own

The men and women on pages B5-B7 have made tzedakah, tikkun olam and community involvement constant priorities in their lives. Their unrelenting commitment to Jewish values helps enrich the lives of so many. They received their awards on June 20 at UJA Federation's Awards Night.

BEN SADOWSKI AWARD OF MERIT

UJA Federation created this award in 1960, the single most prestigious acknowledgement the Jewish community bestows upon a volunteer with outstanding leadership qualities and years of involvement in the Jewish and general communities. With his unwavering commitment to people, Ben Sadowski z"l, the first President of the United Jewish Welfare Fund (predecessor to UJA Federation), embodied the definition of a natural leader. This award is his legacy to the Jewish community.

FRAN SONSHINE

A former elementary school teacher, Fran has been a prominent leader in Toronto's Jewish community for many years with a long and proud history of involvement in philanthropy and volunteering. Fran is currently the National Chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, whose mission is to promote awareness of the Holocaust and its universal lessons through education and commemorative programming in Canada. Fran was Co-Chair of United Jewish Appeal's 2009 Annual Campaign and the Chair of Women's Campaign & Advocacy in 2005. She is a past Lion of Judah Endowment Chair, a past member of the National Women's Philanthropy Board of the United Jewish Communities, today known as Jewish Federations of North America, the umbrella organization for North American Federations, and the 2010 Toronto community recipient of that organization's Kipnis-Wilson/Friedland Award. Fran is a past Chair of both the Baycrest Board of Directors and its Foundation, a Trustee of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, a past President of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO, a National Vice-President of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, and Chaired the 1999 Brazilian Ball. Fran and her husband, Eddie, established one of the first Legacy Funds for the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. Fran has been married to Eddie for 42 years. They have 3 children and 8 grandchildren.

"Community involvement has always been part of my life. As a child of Holocaust Survivors, I took the importance of ensuring the future of the Jewish people and taking care of the most vulnerable, very seriously. I always understood that my passion and commitment must be demonstrated not just in words, but in actions and that to have a meaningful life, meant that I needed to do more than just take care of myself. Along the way, my life has been enriched by the people I have met and the experiences I have had. Hopefully, both Eddie and I have been able to instill the importance of community involvement in our children as well."

Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence

This award honours individuals who exemplify the best in United Jewish Appeal campaigning. When it came to the welfare of world Jewry, few were more committed than Phil Granovsky z"l, who saw Israel and the Diaspora as an extension of his family. Granovsky's selfless legacy continues to help countless people in the community every single year.

DAVID DULBERG

David started his dynamic volunteer career with the United Jewish Appeal Annual Campaign as a canvasser in its Young Leadership Division in the early 1990's and has canvassed a large number of donors ever since becoming active in the campaign. As a result of leading by example, David soon worked his way up to Chair of Young Construction, then part of the Real Estate Cabinet and followed this as Chair of Real Estate Finance. David remained an active canvasser in the Real Estate Cabinet and served as Vice Chair in 2002 and Chair in 2003. During this time he also participated as a canvasser in the Major Gifts Division as well as being a trainer to new canvassers. In 2010 David became Co-Chair of the York Region Cabinet with his Co-Chair Jeff Ross, and, together, they continue to boost the UJA Annual Campaign in York Region. David continues to be a Co-Chair of that Cabinet for Campaign 2012. He also participates regularly in UJA telethons and, with his wife Risa, hosts campaign events at their home. David has encouraged his children to lead by example as well and his son Zachary was a recent participant in Birthright Israel and his son Michael has become a telethon canvasser and has participated in this year's March of the Living. David is also new to the UJA Federation Board of Directors this year.

"I am extremely honoured to receive this award. Being associated with an extraordinary community leader like Phil Granovsky is truly humbling and has inspired me to try to do more for the community every day. I have always felt that it is our solemn responsibility to do everything that we can to help others who are less fortunate than ourselves and provide every member of our community with the ability to live their lives with dignity, respect and meaning. I believe that making a meaningful gift to the UJA Annual Campaign, as well as providing leadership and example through volunteering as a canvasser, are vital in order to build a vibrant community and one with heart that will always be there to support and help the vulnerable."

Past Chairs Lederman Award

This award, named for Harold Lederman z"l, is presented to an outstanding philanthropic leader and volunteer who is also a past Chair of the United Jewish Appeal Annual Campaign. Lederman, driven by a keen social conscience and strong support for Jewish communal life, believed in the importance of continuity. His message to future generations was to be responsible, a legacy of a real philanthropic leader.

PAUL MORTON

Paul G. Morton has been actively involved in both the Jewish and general community since moving to Toronto from Winnipeg in the 1970s, and it's clear that Winnipeg's loss was Toronto's gain. As a UJA Federation and Jewish community leader, Paul's passion and generosity has paid considerable dividends for Jewish Toronto. He chaired the inaugural Financial Resource Development Committee, as well as the Annual UJA Campaign, the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (known today as The Tomorrow Campaign) and UJA's Past Chair Committee. Paul has also lent his considerable time and talents to the community as a Director of Mount Sinai Hospital and as a Co-Chair of Baycrest's Capital Fundraising Campaign. He has also served as President of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University. In the community-at-large, Paul has served as the Chairman of Skydome (now the Rogers Centre), was a member of the Executive Committee of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corp., Director of the Toronto Symphony, as well as both the National and Royal Winnipeg Ballet companies. Paul is also the founding Chairman of the Variety Clubs sports training and fitness centre.

"With privilege comes responsibility. If those who have earned or inherited success do not contribute to making the community, Jewish or secular, a better place to live and raise families, then we all lose."

Volunteer Excellence: Leadership Development Awards

These awards, established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles, are presented to those individuals who demonstrate extraordinary commitment and service.

Leah has brought her strong background in community development and special events to the Herzig Eye Institute in Toronto, where she currently works closely with the CEO in Business Development including implementing digital marketing and planning strategies.

"As part of our remarkable Jewish community, I truly consider it a privilege and an honour to have the opportunity to continue to perpetuate the values of tikkun olam and tzedakah in an effort to pass down all that is strong about the community to the next generation, the future leaders of Jewish Toronto."

Steve and his wife Alina are the proud parents of Leora, Josh, Jonah, Arielle and Abby.

"I'm thankful for the opportunity to volunteer on behalf of UJA because I feel there is no better way to support Israel and the myriad of Jewish institutions in our community. In doing so, I was merely continuing the tradition of tzedakah and volunteerism that my grandparents and parents have demonstrated throughout their lives. I continue to be inspired by the outstanding work of UJA and the commitment, devotion and tireless efforts of its staff and volunteers."

MOIZ BEHAR
Kehilla Residential Programme

Moiz has been active with Kehilla Residential Programme since 1999. Shortly after joining the Kehilla Board as a Director, Moiz became the Chairman of the New Initiative Committee. As Chair he was instrumental in spearheading workshops to explore opportunities to create affordable housing for the Jewish community in cooperation with housing agencies and the development industry. After a few years, Moiz became the Vice President of the Board of Kehilla and approximately 5 years ago he became the President of the Board. During his presidency, Moiz continued Kehilla's efforts to promote awareness of the need for affordable housing in the larger community and the Jewish community. He guided Kehilla's contributions in creating a supportive housing building on the Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, and developing closer cooperation with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"I have had the pleasure of being involved with a variety of activities that keep Kehilla in the forefront of the affordable housing issue. Initially, as the Chair of the New Initiatives Committee, later as VP and President of the Board of Directors, I have been involved in the running of the agency and with the coordination and implementation of initiatives to raise awareness, promote and provide affordable housing. As a volunteer, it is an honour for me to serve on the Board and Executive of Kehilla and assist in many of its worthwhile endeavours."

SHARON WEINTRAUB
JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto

Since 2006 Sharon has been a donor and Co-Chair of JIAS Toronto's Shindman/ ShaRna Scholarship Committee which provides scholarships to immigrants for post secondary education and/or career advancement. Sharon started the ShaRna Foundation - which helps social service agencies, many from within the Jewish community - in her mother's memory. The ShaRna Foundation made a generous donation to the Shindman Scholarship Fund to assist newcomers with post-secondary education. As an immigrant to Canada herself, Sharon was a strong proponent of expanding the scholarship eligibility criteria to include adult students. Sharon takes great pride in being able to support and encourage the newest immigrants to our community in this way.

"Coming to Canada as a young child, I know firsthand how important it is to support the education of the next generation so that they can become active, contributing members of our community. I take great pride in being able to play a part with JIAS Toronto in helping to encourage new immigrants and support their education."

ALAN BERDOWSKI
Hillel of Greater Toronto

Alan graduated from Herzliah High School in Montreal and was well grounded in the importance of contributing to the Jewish community as a young adult. Over the years he has served in a variety of ways within the Jewish community but his greatest passion has been for Hillel, serving on its Board in many capacities over the last 8 years. As president, Alan has strengthened the Hillel Board by initiating a comprehensive strategic planning process; implementing a new discipline around fundraising efforts and financial controls and developing a formal employee code of conduct. He provided community leadership during the peak IAW years, largely by having Hillel lead the effort of coordinating a counter-offensive across our community partners. Alan made it a priority for Hillel to create a broad-based, engaging programming calendar, reaching out and increasing involvement from as many Jewish students as possible.

"It's ironic that supporting the Jewish community is considered 'volunteer' work as I personally benefit so much by doing it. I gain from the wisdom and camaraderie of the wonderful people I work with; I recharge from the enthusiasm of our young adult leaders; my children learn by example; and I am fortified being part of a stronger Jewish community and Israel each and every day."

HAROLD WOLKIN
Miles Nadal JCC

Harold was the Chair of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (MNJCC) Board of Directors from 2007 to 2009. He has served on the Board of the MNJCC through UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign and brought it forward to its position of strength and commitment to the community today. As his parting legacy, he and his wife became the lead donors for a new daycare initiative, The Libbie Cowan Childcare Centre at the MNJCC. This is but one example of where Harold Wolkin not only talked the talk but also walked the walk and the MNJCC is the stronger for it. It has now enabled the MNJCC to offer the Jewish life journey from cradle through to Active Seniors.

"I receive great satisfaction using my skill set and enthusiasm to set goals and objectives and help bring projects and initiatives to fruition. As importantly, I want to make my contribution, as small as it may be, relative to the larger community, important and meaningful to the organizations that I serve. And, I very much enjoy and benefit from the many relationships with other like minded community peers that I am able to develop through my volunteerism."

Remembering the past

Jewish Toronto joined cities around the world to mark the annual Holocaust Remembrance Day (Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah) on Sunday, May 1, with a commemorative ceremony at Earl Bales Park.

Co-sponsored by UJA's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem with the support of many community organizations, this was the only city-wide commemoration in Toronto and the largest commemoration outside Israel with 2,000 attendees.

This year's ceremony paid tribute to "The Faces Behind the Stories" - Holocaust survivors in the community, their personal stories of survival and their contributions to Holocaust education. The commemoration also featured stories of the Holocaust told by 3 generations – a survivor, the child of survivors and the grandchild of survivors.

Our Community Ca

There was a lot on the line!

Under the incredible leadership of UJA's 2010 Telethon Chairs Janice Tkatch and David Weinberg, more than 600 enthusiastic and passionate volunteers gave their time and talents to help make Super Sunday / Super Week a huge success, raising funds for UJA's 2011 Campaign. All in all, when the year was done, telethon volunteers helped raise $4.9 million towards the Campaign from close to 9,000 generous donors.

Sharing the light of the menorah

It was truly a Chanukah to remember across the GTA in 2010, as more than 1,400 participants enjoyed a unique holiday celebration, sponsored by UJA Federation at four locations throughout the GTA, including the LOL Lounge (pictured), which hosted over 400 participants between the ages of 20 and 30, who celebrated Chanukah with great music and dancing.

Walk with Israel 2010 Sunday, May 30, 2010, was a day like no other, and one that Jewish Toronto had waited nearly four decades for. On a hot, humid morning, with temperatures in downtown Toronto soaring to Jerusalem-like conditions, close to 15,000 participants of UJA's annual Walk with Israel - chaired by husband and wife team, Bruce and Lianne Leboff - were treated to an emotional live address inside the Ricoh Coliseum from Israeli Prime Minister, Benjamin Netanyahu who made the trip to Toronto with his wife, Sara.

It was the first time since 1978 that a sitting Israeli Prime Minister - Menachem Begin - had addressed Toronto's Jewish community, and from the reaction of those on hand, it was worth the wait.

New era in community advocacy to begin

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Call it the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy 2.0 (CIJA 2.0) – for now.

The much-anticipated reconfiguration of the existing Canadian Jewish community national advocacy structure will officially begin on July 1.

Gone are organizations including the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), Quebec Israel Committee (QIC), the University Outreach Committee (UOC) and National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL).

All their functions have now been absorbed into a greater Canadian Jewish advocacy apparatus under the auspices of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), which had previously acted as the umbrella organization for the above-mentioned agencies.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of CIJA 2.0, confirmed the news to The CJN last week while he was in the midst of personally informing CJC, QIC, UOC, CIC and NJCL staff of their future – or lack thereof – within the new organization.

On June 5, the boards of CIJA and United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC) approved a major overhaul of communal organizations.

Several senior employees of Congress have lost their jobs in the wake of the restructuring process.

Notices of dismissal, effective June 30, were sent to Benjamin Shinewald, CJC's Toronto-based acting CEO; Wendy Lampert, national director of community relations; and Enza Martuccelli, director of community relations in CJC's Montreal office.

Two longtime CJC employees in the Ottawa office – Eric Vernon, the director of government relations and international affairs, and Josh Rotblatt, the director of operations – received notices effective July 31.

Romy Ritter, regional director in Vancouver, was told her employment will not continue with CJC.

The personnel moves were "mandated" by CIJA, said Congress President Mark Freiman in a statement to his board on June 24.

"I grieve for our community's loss in terms of the talents and devoted service of those whose employment CIJA has decided to terminate," Freiman said.

A grim anniversary

Noam Schalit, right, and Aviva Schalit, second from left, parents of captive Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, took part in a demonstration in front of the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem on Sunday calling for Gilad's release. The sign held by Noam reads: "Netanyahu, you have no mandate to kill Gilad Schalit." Hamas kidnapped Gilad from his army post in the Negev five years ago on June 25, 2006. [Flash90 photo]

Monument Fixed

HALIFAX — The motorized wheel at the centre of a monument to Jewish refugees from Nazism broke two days after its January unveiling and had to be repaired, the Halifax Chronicle-Herald reported this month. The Wheel of Conscience in the Canadian Museum of Immigration at Halifax's Pier 21 was sent to Toronto to be fixed by its manufacturer and returned months ago, a Pier 21 official said. The monument, a heavy piece with moving gears that was designed by renowned architect Daniel Libeskind, was absent for several weeks. The malfunction was mechanical, not design-related.

Shul Changes Name

PETERBOROUGH, Ont. — The Beth Israel Synagogue in Peterborough, Ont., is changing its name to the Jewish Community Centre of Peterborough to better reflect the fact it's becoming more of a community space than a place of worship, a shul official said. General manager Joe Teichman said the synagogue's board voted unanimously last month for the change. The shul, founded in the early 1900s, serves about 35 families out of some 300 Jews in a city of 110,000 people. Its building dates to 1964.

WORLD

Camper Killed

ATLANTA — An 11th grade camper at Camp Ramah Darom in Clayton, Ga., was killed in an accident on a white-water rafting trip. Andrew Silvershein, of Davie, Fla., died when his raft capsized June 19 on the first day of a trip on the Ocoee River in Tennessee. Six other campers on the raft made it back to shore safely, but Silvershein was trapped underwater under a rock. A paddle was used to free him, but CPR efforts failed. It's the second drowning of a rafter on the Ocoee River this month. A guide rode on each raft and campers wore life preservers and helmets. Silvershein was entering his junior year in high school and played in his school's marching band. His younger sister was also a camper at Ramah Darom. The accident occurred during the first week of the camp's eight-week session.

Galliano On Trial

PARIS — Fashion designer John Galliano blamed alcohol and drugs as he went on trial in Paris last week for making antisemitic and racist remarks to patrons at a local café, which he says he can't remember. Galliano faces up to six months in jail and a fine of $32,000 on charges of "public insults based on origin, religious affiliation, race or ethnicity." In February, Galliano was videotaped making racist remarks at La Perle bar. A similar incident reportedly occurred in October. After the video surfaced showing him shouting "I love Hitler," he was fired from his job as head designer at Christian Dior. Since then, he's apologized and been in treatment for alcohol and drug abuse.

B'nai Brith Backs Hijab-Clad Soccer Ref

Allan Adel

MONTREAL — B'nai Brith Canada says a teenaged Montreal girl who wears the Muslim hijab should be allowed to continue refereeing soccer.

It's called on the Quebec Soccer Federation to review a rule that says officials can't wear any religious symbol.

"We are concerned that the federation's outright ban on hijabs does not meet the province's human rights code," said Allan Adel, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights. "In the past, we have advised that where there are genuine safety issues, viable alternatives must be sought so that entire segments of the population are not excluded."

Sarah Benkirane, 15, was told last week that she can no longer work for the Lac St. Louis Regional Soccer Association if she continues to wear the traditional head scarf. She has been officiating games on the West Island and Vaudreuil for the past two years.

The rule is being enforced now reportedly because a complaint was made against Benkirane. The rule barring religious gear is in line with the regulations of FIFA, the international soccer governing body.

New fund will assist needy survivors

Survivor community grows because they come here from other cities

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

A new fund has been set up to help local Holocaust survivors in need.

The fund was established as the result of a recent meeting in New York City between senior community leaders and officials of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, which, among other things, provides funds to Jewish agencies that give support to Holocaust survivors.

"I told [Claims Conference officials] that there is a large number of survivors in the Greater Toronto Area, and I felt that we were not receiving an equitable share of available money," said Sandi Pelly, director of community capacity building, aging in place and inclusion with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, who attended the meeting.

"They agreed to provide us with an additional $500,000 for 2010 and 2011, because UJA Federation agreed to provide matching funds. This is because of the generosity of Toronto's Jewish community.

"But additional matching funds are required. If agencies don't come up with the required matching funds, they'll lose a portion of the grant. That's why we've established the new fund, specifically dedicated to help our agencies come up with the matching funds."

With more than 10,000 survivors in the GTA, she said, "we are home to one of the largest survivor communities in the world."

In fact, Toronto is the only community outside of Israel in which the survivor community continues to grow, because they're coming here from other cities and countries to join their families, Pelly said.

"[Many] seniors are poor when they come to Canada, and on top of that, they're not eligible for government benefits for 10 years. UJA Federation has become their safety net. We have a responsibility to help them."

Holocaust survivors are particularly vulnerable, Pelly said, because as they age, a number of emotional issues arise, particularly if they have dementia.

Sandi Pelly

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress – presently on a leave of absence – and a child of a Holocaust survivor, said that it's "terrible to think that people who survived ghettoes and horrors at the hands of the Nazis should now find themselves financially insecure, alone, ill or in need of help."

Farber, who sits on the board and executive of the Claims Conference, said that the agency's funds help improve survivors' quality of life.

Rambam, the hospital

Often overlooked in tourists' compressed schedules to visit as many historic sites in Israel in as little time as possible is the northern city of Haifa.

This is a great shame and a loss to the rushing-around tourists, for Haifa is a beautiful and charming place.

Some people say it reminds them of San Francisco. More people say that San Francisco reminds them of Haifa, absent of course, the breathtaking Baha'i temple and its stunningly verdant gardens.

Where mountain meets ocean and ocean meets valley lies Haifa.

Jews have lived in Haifa since at least the third century CE. The city is mentioned in talmudic literature. The origin of its name is not quite clear. However, some surmise it is a contraction of two Hebrew words, chof yafeh, meaning beautiful coast. If indeed that is the case, the city is true to its name.

The CJN was in Haifa last month, not to enjoy its mountain vistas or to walk its long up-and-downhill winding roads, but rather to observe daily life at the Rambam Hospital, the largest hospital serving the north of Israel.

Readers may know of Rambam because of the many images of army helicopters landing on the helipad unloading soldiers wounded in fighting in the country's wars, most recently the Second Lebanon War.

All of Israel knows of Rambam, or to use its official name, Rambam Health Care Campus (RHCC), because of its unique history and the irreplaceable role it plays in the medical life of the country.

Many scientists and physicians around the world, too, know of Rambam because of the unceasing wave of medico-biological, high-tech innovations that emanate from it.

Rafael Beyar

Campus is indeed an appropriate term for the health centre in light of its size and its many component sections. The hospital is a veritable mini-city whose residents are dedicated to one cause: the saving of human life.

Rambam provides a full range of health-care services to some two million people from all parts and places of the north. It is also the exclusive provider there for oncology, neurosurgery, molecular imaging and complex trauma treatment.

The CJN's visit came at a time when the hospital is in the midst of a long-term expansion project aimed at enhancing the hospital's clinical and research capabilities. Four new buildings are on the drawing board: children's care, cancer care, cardiovascular care, and biomedical research centre.

From the editor's desk...

Dr. Rafael Beyar has been the general director and chief executive office of RHCC since 2006. Although he is called upon to use his considerable administrative expertise these days, his chief medical expertise is in interventional cardiology. The key message that Beyar imparted was that Rambam is at the forefront initiating leading-edge medical practices and breakthroughs. Referring to the recent bestselling book by Dan Senor and Saul Singer about Israel's economic miracle called Start-Up Nation, Beyar said that "Israel is a startup nation in medicine as well."

He was quite definitive, quite proud. "Rambam has produced medical breakthroughs and innovations that have transformed how medicine is practised." He cited three examples on the spot – the use of human embryonic stem cells, the use of robotics in surgery and the use of hybrid diagnostic imaging. He pointed out there were many more such examples.

"Medicine has no borders," Beyar said. "International collaboration is one of the ways we transcend borders. In strengthening and advancing the quality of medicine in Israel, the Rambam Hospital also strengthens and advances the quality of medicine around the world."

Speaking this way about the potential for wide universal benefit from the work at the hospital, Beyar was actually paraphrasing the words of the 12th-century philosopher-scholar-physician after whom the hospital is named, and whose words appear in the entranceway to the hospital.

"Grant me the strength, time and opportunity always to correct what I have acquired, always to extend its domain; for knowledge is immense and the spirit of man can extend itself indefinitely to enrich itself with new requirements."

Next week, I will write about some of the people at Rambam who have extended and continue to extend the domain of knowledge. The Rambam would be proud of the place. And so should we.

CHAT TRACK STAR 16TH IN PROVINCE

Ahsher Zeldin, a Grade 9 student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, recently finished 16th in the Ontario Federation of School Athletic Associations (OFSAA) 100-metre midget hurdles championships. Zeldin qualified for the OFSAA event, which took place at Laurentian University in Sudbury, Ont., following a high finish in the Metro Toronto championships. Zeldin started running in Grade 6, placing first among the Jewish day school students and continued improving under the direction of coach Mark Rottman. "Placing in the top 20 in the province was a shocker," Zeldin said. "I now know what to expect and will keep practising to get me there again next year." Zeldin's goal is to represent Canada at the 2013 Maccabiah Games.

Oliver a rookie MP with loads of experience

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Joe Oliver may be a rookie Conservative cabinet minister, but he's got plenty of experience as a decision-maker.

Oliver, 71, unseated Joe Volpe, the longtime Liberal incumbent for the riding of Eglinton-Lawrence, in May's federal election and was sworn in as minister of natural resources last month. He told The CJN he's looking forward to bringing fiscal stability to his riding and to all Canadians.

Born in Montreal, Oliver received his MBA from Harvard in 1970 before moving to Toronto in 1971.

Joe Oliver

He spent years as an investment banker and securities specialist with numerous firms before embarking on his political career last year as a member of the Conservative government.

Oliver said while he's proud of his Jewish heritage, he doesn't think of himself as a "Jewish parliamentarian," but rather as the MP for Eglinton-Lawrence and a cabinet minister.

"We all bring personal values to our role, but I don't think my religion was relevant to my election," he said. Oliver noted, however, that his riding does have a large Jewish constituency.

According to the 2006 census, the riding's population is about 110,000, and 39 per cent of the residents are immigrants. About 17 per cent are Jewish and 11 per cent Italian.

There are three Jewish members of Parliament now – Oliver, York Centre Conservative MP Mark Adler and Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

Oliver said he decided to enter politics after many years of being interested in that field in his previous jobs as executive director of the Ontario Securities Commission and president of the Investment Dealers Association of Canada. Also, he's a self-admitted public policy wonk.

"This is a fulfilment of a real interest," he said. After his successful years in business, he was looking "for something else meaningful to do."

As natural resources minister, Oliver is responsible for a number of national organizations, including Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, the National Energy Board and the Nuclear Safety Commission.

He's also responsible for the non-profit foundation Sustainable Development Technology Canada.

He said he plans to leverage the latter organization by co-ordinating missions with the Ministry of the Environment – headed by Thornhill MP Peter Kent – and looking into partnerships with Israeli innovators in the sector.

"I haven't explored it specifically, but I would like to go to Israel to explore these issues," he said. "The natural resources portfolio encompasses forestry, mining, oil and gas, nuclear... and accounts for a significant portion of Canada's GDP [gross domestic product]. There are enormous oil resources in [Alberta's] oil sands and these represent the third-largest oil reserves in the world after Saudi Arabia and Venezuela."

Oliver said exploiting these resources has to be done in an "environmentally responsible way."

To that end, finding ways to mitigate greenhouse gas emissions and searching for alternative energy resources means "looking around the world for ideas." And Israel is one of those places, he said.

Minister of Natural Resources exploring partnerships with Israeli innovators

"Israel's been astonishing in its productivity and creativity" with its limited natural resources and environmental issues, he said.

Canada, he said, has a great relationship with Israel "on a lot of fronts." This should provide ample opportunity for his ministry to "sit down with my counterparts in Israel."

Asked what priority issues he plans to work on in his riding during his term in office, Oliver said it all comes down to the economy.

"When I was canvassing in my riding, one issue that resonated quite well was the issue of having a representative from Toronto advocate for the city inside a Conservative government. Now that I'm in cabinet, I have an opportunity to do that," he said.

"There are big issues [facing Toronto]. Infrastructure. Transportation. We are in a period of [fiscal] restraint... nevertheless, the city has important needs, and I'll be advocating for them in a fiscally responsible way."

Group targets TD Bank over Pride, QuAIA

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Since April, a group called StopSponsoringHatred.com has targeted the Toronto Pride Parade's main sponsor, TD Bank, in an effort to get the financial giant to pull its funding from the Pride festival because of the past – and possibly ongoing – participation of the group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA).

On side with Pride

please see page 28

While that goal won't be achieved this year, since 2011 Pride Week is now underway and TD has not pulled its sponsorship, the group has its sights set on 2012.

David Nitkin, one of the group's founders and a "corporate ethics professional" with 20 years experience, told The CJN last week that his grassroots organization won't back down until the bank accedes to its demands.

Over the last few months, members of the group have protested in front of various TD locations in Toronto to get their message out.

"I wanted to see if we could put a stake through the heart of Israel apartheid speech in the city where it really had its global start," said Nitkin, who is not gay.

He said that while many other sponsors of Pride could, and should, be targeted – he mentioned Labatt and the Ontario government as others – the banking sector is one he knows well.

In his work, Nitkin has conducted many audits on codes of conduct and ethics for banks and other financial institutions, he said.

"I looked at the bank and asked myself 'Is TD Bank directly or indirectly supporting this kind of political hate speech?'" he said.

Nitkin added that the bank has also never revealed the nature of its sponsorship agreement with Pride Toronto, although he admitted it's under no legal obligation to do so.

"There are, in my opinion, some very serious problems with this approach by the TD Bank," Nitkin said. "Pride Toronto has internal management problems – their previous executive director was fired for mismanagement of funds, and as an organization itself, it's conflicted in its mission."

Scott Mullin, vice-president of community relations with TD Bank Group, said TD isn't sponsoring hate speech.

"We have had nothing to do with, or sponsored or endorsed QuAIA," he said. "What we are sponsoring is an event that occurs in a big city where lots of people with varying views, not all of which we agree with, ended up participating. [QuAIA] attracted a lot of attention."

He said TD began funding Toronto Pride six years ago in order to demonstrate to its staff that it was "comfortable" with the gay community.

Mullin said his bank supported the Pride Toronto executive throughout its internal review last year, which saw the organization restructure its policies regarding participants in the parade and its complaints process.

"We think [Pride's] new road map going forward, will strengthen it and make it a successful event."

Nitkin said he was scheduled to meet with "three senior people" at Pride Toronto this year, but all three cancelled.

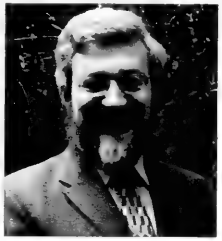
The three are Pride Toronto interim executive director Glen Brown, Pride co-chair Francisco Alvarez, and Ryan Lester, Pride's head of fundraising, Nitkin said.

Alvarez confirmed to The CJN that he and Brown are scheduled to meet with Nitkin after this year's parade to discuss Stop Sponsoring Hatred's concerns.

He also confirmed that QuAIA has not been formally barred, but that it has agreed not to participate in any form during this year's Pride Week or Pride Parade.

Earlier this year, the group said it won't march in the parade, but that it will hold its own, separate events during Pride Week.

As for meeting with TD representatives, Nitkin said his group has not formally asked for a meeting and is content for the moment to continue exerting pressure on the bank by encouraging TD clients to withdraw their money if they disagree with it funding Pride while QuAIA is still formally allowed to participate and promote its "hate speech."



David Nitkin

Toronto city council has decided to withhold city funding from Pride – around $138,000 in grants plus another $250,000 of in-kind cleanup and security costs – until after the week-long event is over in order to ensure that QuAIA isn't allowed to take part.

Nitkin believes QuAIA will crash the July 3 parade regardless of its statements to the contrary. However, if QuAIA doesn't march, Nitkin said there would no longer be a reason for his group to continue its activities "in this way."

However, his group would still demand three things from the bank: a public statement "repudiating Israel apartheid while continuing its support of hate-free Pride festivities"; the disclosure of the public safety, anti-discrimination and political hate conditions of funding within in its current sponsorship agreements with 11 annual Pride Parades in North America, and that the bank act to recover its grants if responsible governance by Parade management fails and QuAIA again participates this year.

Nitkin said only about 55 people in Toronto have pulled their money from TD Bank, in what amounts to about $660,000.

"We're at a very early stage. There are a number of supporters of Israel who are sympathetic to us, but who are hesitant to leave the bank because they've been with the institution for many years."

Nitkin anticipates that more people will join his cause if the controversial group does crash this year's parade.

"Most financial institutions will not support political causes. We think if QuAIA marches this year – and we fully expect them to in some form – that there will be repercussions on TD Bank, and that, lamentably, the city will withdraw its funding. In effect, I'm concerned about the survival of the Pride Parade. With all the sponsors under pressure, all the goodwill and success of the parade will disappear."

REAL SOLID. REAL RESULTS. REAL CONSISTENT. REAL FLEXIBLE.

SPECIAL PRESENTATION: International recording star Shakira visited Israel last week to open the Israeli Presidential Conference – Facing Tomorrow 2011, hosted by Israeli President Shimon Peres. Former Toronto resident Dana Krupat, 8, seen with Peres and Shakira, presented the singer and founder of the non-profit ALAS Foundation (Latin America in Solidary Action) with a necklace designed by Israeli silversmith and artist Ben-Zion David as a gift from the State of Israel. Dana, a former student of Associated Hebrew Day Schools, lives in Ra'anana.

Top-down approach being applied

Fogel said the need for wholesale restructuring of the Jewish advocacy system stemmed from the fact that the lines between anti-Israel sentiment and antisemitism had become almost indistinguishable.

"The lines and distinctions between what they used to call 'the domestic agenda' and 'the Israel agenda' have blurred so much, that it's impossible really to tell one from the other," he said. "When is it anti-Zionism? When is it antisemitism? This is the nature of where things have gone internationally."

Fogel said these distinctions had become "increasingly artificial," to the point where it became difficult for CIJA agencies like Congress and CIC to figure out which agency should respond to what.

"We had an opportunity to integrate and consolidate all the thematic agendas – campus, antisemitism, Israel relations, social policy agenda at the local community level – all of those things could be brought into one, holistic institution," he said.

CIJA 2.0 will now have "departments" that deal with these different items, instead of the agencies that existed to address these issues before.

It's a top-down approach that is being applied in order to "clarify and simplify" messaging on Jewish advocacy, Fogel said.

All the details of the new structure are contained in a document called CIJA 2.0: A Roadmap for the Reorganization of Jewish Advocacy in Canada.

A national strategy development committee will report to the CIJA 2.0 board on messaging related to campus needs, Israel, social justice and human rights, the defence agenda and domestic needs, according to CIJA 2.0 internal guidelines.

As a national entity, CIJA 2.0 will create policy and messaging for "local partners" throughout the country's Jewish communities.

Each local partner will be "anchored or embedded" in a local federation – in smaller Jewish communities without a federation presence, there will be an alternative. For instance, in Atlantic Canada, the Atlantic Jewish Council will be the de facto local partner. And each community will be represented by a local public affairs committee, Fogel said.

CIJA 2.0 "will provide resources" for all local partners, and the chairs of the local committees will, together, form a national cabinet.

This cabinet will convene to co-ordinate, share best practices, raise local concerns and flag emerging trends or issues for the national executive to provide guidance on.

CIJA's Roadmap clarifies the relationship between CIJA 2.0 and UIAFC as one where the latter "defines advocacy policy while CIJA 2.0 develops and implements advocacy delivery strategies to carry out these policies."

The new board of CIJA 2.0 will be determined at a meeting, "probably in the first week of July" when its nominations committee appoints the members, Fogel said.

The organization's official 'brand name' will be announced shortly

The CIJA 2.0 board will have its inaugural meeting "very soon thereafter."

The members of CIJA 2.0 will be the corporation's "shareholders."

"The members are the ones who appoint the board, just like in any conventional corporate model," he said.

CIJA 2.0 will be headquartered in Ottawa. The organization's official "brand name" will be announced shortly, Fogel said.

Among the names still being considered is Canadian Jewish Congress, he said, though CIJA 2.0's branding committee is still finishing its work.

Fogel said the restructuring also affects federation staffing in that many people are being "shifted" from their prior federation roles into CIJA 2.0 roles.

"Federation is handing over all responsibility for advocacy to CIJA 2.0," he said. "That means that CIJA national, and all its local partners whose staff are embedded in federations, will be responsible for the whole range of advocacy."

CIJA 2.0 is also getting set to "roll out" its communications strategy to all its local partners, so they can have a list of national contacts to reference for any issue that arises.

Fogel would not comment on who comprised the new senior management team for CIJA 2.0, as there was still one post outstanding, that of communications director.

He said an offer had gone out, but was still being contemplated by the applicant.

"Fundamentally, above all else, [CIJA 2.0 is] a lobby. Our job is to advocate on issues that enhance and improve the position of the Jewish community and the issues that are of concern to them. Everything else is important, but secondary," Fogel said.

"We were talking about consolidating Congress and CIC more than a decade ago," he added.

Kidnappers in Gaza and their friends

The fifth anniversary of the kidnapping of Gilad Schalit by Hamas henchmen and his captivity, presumably somewhere in Gaza, were commemorated last Saturday in Israel with anguish and anger: anguish over the young man's plight, and anger that there still is a plight. In Gaza, by contrast, the anniversary arrived and passed with cavalier indifference and a carefully practised expression of indignant victimhood.

Schalit's family is upset with their own government for not having yet concluded an agreement with Gilad's kidnappers.

Israel's prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, said on Sunday that he had accepted a German mediator's proposal, but that Hamas had not yet provided a "formal answer" to it.

Mahmoud Zahar, a senior Hamas leader in Gaza, said talks "won't be resumed until the captors' demands are met." And for five years, Hamas has prevented the Red Cross, or any other humanitarian agency from seeing or speaking or visiting with young Schalit.

French president Nicolas Sarkozy sent a letter to the Schalit family in which he reminded the world that Hamas was violating international law by holding Schalit. "I cannot accept that you are forbidden from simple communication with your relatives and from receiving messages from them in return..." Sarkozy wrote. "I urge those who are imprisoning you to immediately permit the Red Cross to meet with you, and more than that – to return you to freedom."

Sarkozy's plea, like all such pleas from men and women of good conscience, fell on deaf ears.

Despite the gross violation of international law and the very public display of cold, callous cruelty toward the Schalit family, the second "Freedom Flotilla" will be sailing this week toward Gaza to show solidarity and lend comfort to the kidnappers from Hamas who rule there.

As of this writing, the flotilla comprises ships from Ireland, Greece, Spain, Italy, France, Canada, the United States, Germany/Switzerland, Sweden and the Netherlands. And notwithstanding the pronouncements – and even good intentions – of flotilla participants that they are merely bringing humanitarian supplies to the beleaguered people of Gaza, there must be no softpedalling or sugar-coating the import of what they are really doing: They are aiding Gilad Schalit's kidnappers, Gaza's Islamist rulers, whose charter lauds genocide, the killing of Jews, and advocates politicide, the destruction of the sole Jewish state on earth. Through naivety or malevolence, flotilla participants are complicit in Hamas' grotesque aims.

In either case, shame on them.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israeli defence minister Yitzhak Rabin accused Syria of complicity in a terror bombing at Madrid's Barajas International Airport. Eight people were injured when a bomb went off in some luggage before it was loaded onto an El Al flight to Israel. Rabin said a man with a Syrian passport gave the bag to an accomplice at the airport.

Israel needs a new story

The world consensus that Israel should base its borders on the 1967 lines reveals a fundamental weakness in Israel's position. Resolution 242, crafted after the Six Day War, was based on the concept of a secure border for the Jewish state.

It seems Israel's position has deteriorated since then. That deterioration reflects the fact that much of the world no longer accepts the story that Israel uses to justify its position. If something isn't working, then perhaps it is time to think of doing something different. In this case, Israel should present a fundamentally different story.

Perhaps the new story can be that for 2,000 years, the homeland of the Jewish People was occupied by various alien invaders. These invaders created conditions that resulted in the continuous exile of the Jewish People from the Land of Israel. In spite of the deplorable conditions, some Jews always returned. One should emphasize that the Jews never abandoned or surrendered their homeland. The Land of Israel remained a Jewish possession for the past 2,000 years. The Balfour Declaration, the League of Nations approval of that declaration and the UN partition resolution of Nov. 29, 1947, are really irrelevant.

It seems to me reasonable to emphasize the continuity of the Jewish People in its land, rather than the 2,000-year exile from it.

National community leaders in politics

Letter writer Michael Marmur, in defence of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) CEO Bernie Farber's candidacy for the Liberals in the upcoming Ontario election, wrote that if we prevent such people from running, then we would deny ourselves an excellent pool of candidates, including Farber as well as Michael Mostyn ("Farber's candidacy in Ont. election," June 10). The difficulty with Marmur's position lies in his problematic comparison between these two individuals.

Although Farber and Mostyn, until recently, were high-level national representatives of the Jewish community in non-partisan organizations, namely CJC and B'nai Brith respectively, while Farber took a belated leave of absence from CJC, publicly declaring his intention to return to Congress should he fail in his electoral bid, Mostyn completely severed his relationship with B'nai Brith prior to accepting the Progressive Conservative party nomination. Mostyn had no safety net or deals to be rehired in the future, which is commendable, but Farber's entry seems to be a win-win deal for himself. Non-partisan community organizations should stay non-partisan, and while community leaders should always be free to enter the world of politics, they should not unfairly taint their organizations with partisanship, creating a win-win for themselves at the expense of the non-partisan organizations that they represent, in this case, CJC.

PM's support for Israel

Agudath Israel of Montreal, an Orthodox Jewish communal organization, commends Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his principled stance concerning the State of Israel. He has shown moral courage in supporting the one true democracy in the Middle East whose values reflect our own. Most recently, at the G8 summit in France, Harper was able to prevent his colleagues from drafting a final communiqué regarding the Mideast peace process that would only mention the pre-1967 borders, borders that are indefensible to anyone familiar with the geography of the area.

God in the Bible (Genesis 12:3) promised our forefather Abraham: "And I will bless those who bless you." Through his words and actions, Harper has consistently blessed the Jewish People. May God, in turn, shower His blessings upon him, his family, his government and this great nation of ours. And may God give him the strength to continue standing with Israel, so that we can forever be the "true north strong and free!"

Interfaith park cleanup

I wish to share my reflections on an interfaith cleanup May 23 of Mackenzie-King Park in Snowdon by Rabbi Schachar Orenstein's team of more than 200 people of many cultures and all ages. With the inspiring leadership of Rabbi Orenstein of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, they finished the job after a few hours. The park was clean thanks to the spirit of love and co-operation. We hope our hearts continue to be filled with love for each other. How lucky I was to share the thrill. Thank you, Rabbi Orenstein for your special care for humanity. You inspire all of us.

Palestinians face pressure to abandon UN bid

Leslie Susser
JTA

The pressure on Mahmoud Abbas to back down from plans to seek recognition of Palestinian statehood at the United Nations in September is intensifying.

Squeezed by a combination of concerted American pressure and intense Israeli diplomacy, some top Palestinian leaders are urging the Palestinian Authority president to drop his September plan.

Abbas, however, says he still intends to go ahead with the UN move, unless key international players can get serious peace talks going before then.

"If the Americans, the Europeans and Israel don't want us to go to the UN, they must show me an alternative," he said in an interview on Lebanese TV on Monday.

The PA president repeatedly has declared that he prefers negotiations with Israel to the UN gambit, but he insists on a negotiating framework with clear terms of reference. So far, the United States and others have been unable to produce a formula acceptable to both sides. At least for now, Abbas is saying he won't abandon his UN strategy in the absence of such a framework.

But the pressure is growing.

By far the strongest source has been U.S. President Barack Obama's firm opposition to any Palestinian UN move. Obama's promise to veto any bid in the Security Council for Palestinian UN membership means that the best the Palestinians can hope for is symbolic recognition by the UN General Assembly, not full membership in the world body. And Obama has been exerting heavy pressure on the Europeans to oppose the Palestinians' recognition push.

Obama's position has been reinforced by several congressional initiatives. In December, Congress passed a resolution "condemning unilateral measures to declare or recognize a Palestinian state."

Last week, Rep. Steve Chabot, the Republican chairman of the House foreign affairs committee's Middle East subcommittee, urged the administration to withhold U.S. contributions to the United Nations if it recognizes a Palestinian state. There is also a looming congressional threat to cut off $513 million in U.S. funding for the Palestinian Authority if it goes ahead with plans to bring Hamas, a designated terrorist group, into the Palestinian government.

The specter of U.S. economic pressure backed by widespread western diplomatic opposition has been having a sobering effect on the Palestinians.

A pro-western wing of the Palestinian leadership, led by PA Prime Minister Salam Fayyad and including former Palestinian envoy to the UN Nasser al-Kidwa, is advising Abbas to drop the UN initiative mainly for the sake of good relations with the United States.

They also fear that a UN resolution that fails to change anything on the ground could spark a new cycle of violence and retaliation, destroying years of state-building achievements, especially in the Palestinian economy and security forces.

To soften U.S. opposition, Palestinian supporters of the UN gambit, such as Abbas and his chief negotiators Saeb Erakat and Nabil Shaath, are proposing sending an accompanying letter to the UN recognizing Israel in the 1967 borders and committing to resume negotiations immediately on a state-to-state basis. That, however, is unlikely to cut much ice.

Israel's Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman, right, met earlier in the month in Jerusalem with Catherine Ashton, High Representative for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy of the European Union. [Flash90 photo]

Meanwhile, the Israeli Foreign Ministry has launched a worldwide campaign against UN recognition of a Palestinian state, instructing Israeli embassies across the globe to leave no stone unturned. Even in countries considered lost causes, diplomats have been ordered to do all they can to turn things around.

The aim of the intense Israeli diplomatic activity is twofold: first, to prevent the Palestinians from winning a two-thirds majority in the 192-member General Assembly. Then, if that fails, at least to win what Israeli officials are calling a "moral minority" – in which most western countries, with their moral authority as democracies, vote against recognition of a Palestinian state.

"There is no possible configuration in which Israel wins the vote," a senior aide to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told JTA. "But if we can get that 'moral minority,' then the resolution will be reduced to nothing more than another UN anti-Israel piece of paper."

As part of the campaign to win over the European democracies, Netanyahu has been warning European leaders that a UN resolution that enshrines the 1967 borders will kill off the peace process.

He argues that no Palestinian leader will be able to accept anything less, undermining the long-accepted principle that in any peace treaty, the 1967 lines will have to be modified.

"It will have the same effect as the 1948 UN General Assembly Resolution 194 had on the refugee issue," the Netanyahu aide insisted, referring to the resolution that stipulated that Palestinian refugees wishing to return to home should be permitted to do so, and that compensation should be paid to those who do not.

"Everyone understands that in a peace treaty, Palestinian refugees will return to Palestine, not to Israel," the aide said. "But because of 194, you have a situation in which no Palestinian leader is ready to say so in public."

Israel's legal and diplomatic arguments have apparently struck a chord in some European capitals

Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman goes further. In a mid-June meeting in Jerusalem with the European Union's foreign policy chief, Catherine Ashton, he warned that if the Palestinians made a unilateral approach to the United Nations, they would be in violation of the Oslo agreements, and Israel would no longer consider itself bound by them. Lieberman was picking up on the opinions of several leading Israeli legal experts, including former foreign ministry legal adviser Alan Baker.

Baker, who was closely involved with the Oslo negotiations, claims that by trying to get the international community to unilaterally impose Palestinian positions on Israel, the Palestinians are in breach of the 1995 Oslo interim agreement, which set up the Palestinian Authority and its presidency and parliament on the understanding that all remaining differences would be resolved through negotiations.

"The Palestinian approach to the UN violates the interim agreement and, in so doing, undermines the legal basis of the PA and all the other Palestinian institutions, creating the potential for legal chaos," Baker told JTA.

Israel's legal and diplomatic arguments have apparently struck a chord in some European capitals. Germany, Italy and the European Parliament have all made their opposition to a unilateral Palestinian UN move clear.

Clearly, Abbas is trying to use the specter of September as a stick to get a resumption of peace talks on his terms. But as long as Hamas is part of the Palestinian government, the chances of talks being renewed are slim.

And unless Abbas is persuaded to back down at the 11th hour, the diplomatic battle is more likely to shape up over what comes next: does UN recognition of Palestine isolate Israel, or does it backfire and leave the Palestinians worse off than before?

Renovating our shul for the ages

Our synagogue has embarked on a campaign to build a new sanctuary. We're a bit amazed at the boldness of our goal – I understate the matter – but there it is. In for a penny in for a pound – and in this case, in for millions of dollars.

We're familiar with the "If you build it they will come" theory of institutional development. With apologies to the film Field of Dreams, this doesn't apply to all building projects. Who is not aware of the accusation of "edifice complex" levelled at Jewish institutions?

Yet since biblical times, we as a people have built places of worship that are also tangible places for communities to come together. At first, it was a crude tent of meeting, the mishkan, which accompanied the tribes through the desert. Later, the site at Beth-El where Samuel heard the call to prophecy was eventually replaced by Solomon's Temple in Jerusalem.

King David had wanted to build the temple, but being a "man of blood," he was cautioned that it would be up to his son, Solomon, to achieve this distinction.

Solomon dedicated the First Temple thus: "The Lord has said that He would dwell in thick darkness. I have surely built You a house of habitation, a place for You to dwell in forever."

Sadly, this first temple was plundered and burned to the ground in 586 BCE, to be replaced some 70 years later with a modest new structure. Ironically it was left to the monstrous Herod ("The Great," or "The Butcher," depending on your point of view) to give the Second Temple its grandest renovations.

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

All who have admired the platform and the surviving walls of that structure see in them but the remnants of its former magnificence.

While the Second Temple still stood, according to scholars of its history, the synagogue was already becoming a place of study and Torah reading, even in Jerusalem.

Prof. Lee Levine writes in The Ancient Synagogue: the First Thousand Years: "The synagogue, one of the unique and innovative institutions of antiquity, was central to Judaism and left indelible marks on Christianity and Islam as well."

Architecturally, the synagogue usually echoed surrounding building traditions. This is still true today.

I don't know what our new sanctuary will look like. I hope it will be a warm and welcoming place, rather than huge and environmentally wasteful.

I have been fortunate indeed to have visited a wide variety of synagogues in many different places.

The first ancient synagogue I saw was not an actual building, but wall frescos, taken from the third-century synagogue of Dura Europos in Syria. The frescos have been moved into the Damascus museum, where I was lucky to be able to see them in 1964. You can see copies in the Museum of the Diaspora, but to be in the presence of the originals was a unique experience.

The next one I recall with distress. Wandering the casbah in Algers, I felt drawn toward a ramshackle building being used as a stable and storehouse in the shuk. Its walls were covered with names of donors, families long since banished from Algeria. That barn was actually a defaced synagogue. That experience was uniquely saddening.

In Iran, we searched for a synagogue in Isfahan. After asking over and over for the "Jewish church," we were directed down a winding alley to a building below street level. We descended a few steps into a courtyard, where a baby happily crawled along the soiled flagstones. Inside was a dark, humid, tiny synagogue, open to all, but lacking worshippers. Troubling.

The Altenueshul in Prague, with its worn seats and raised bimah, left us weeping for the children of Treblinka who would never chant their Haftorah in this place. Could it be that the golem still lies, inert, in the attic waiting to be resurrected? The Pinkas synagogue in that same city is covered with the names of murdered Czech Jews. Beyond tears.

Back to Vancouver in 2011. Our present shul was consecrated in 1948, dedicated to the lost synagogues of Europe during the Holocaust. Over the years, it has seen generations pass through its doors. This new effort will, we pray, serve generations to come.

Academic boycotts make no sense

I don't understand the rationale for the boycott of Israeli academics. It's happening in the United Kingdom and is taking root in North America, part of a larger movement of boycotts, divestments and sanctions (BDS). These proposed anti-Israel actions aim to persuade governments to "cease and desist" from certain policies. Despite the fact that they most likely don't work and are based on flawed correlations between Israel and South Africa, I won't discuss them. My point is only that the BDS movement is uniquely inappropriate in the case of academics.

Academics are scholars, people who search for knowledge untainted by political or religious (or any sort of) preference. Their tasks are to seek information removed from common prejudice and slanted stereotypes. They pose interesting questions, gather data or evidence, and seek ways of negotiating the resultant knowledge with other cultural theories and systems. All of this should be very removed from political agendas and government positions. Even the very study of said governments is to be framed in academic language and nonaligned pursuit. Curiosity is the guiding principle, not allegiance to any particular outcome.

Thus, boycotting the very people who seek to pursue this independent knowledge makes no sense from any perspective. It's amazing to see what's written on the Internet by BDS advocates who attack Israeli scholars and Israel studies programs. And those who defend Israel studies and Israeli academics seem to get lost in the rhetoric of the boycotters. Many proclaim that all BDS is a show of anti-semitism. Well, maybe it is and maybe it isn't, but merely making that claim doesn't get us any further toward understanding or resolution. The attack on Israeli academics needs to be addressed on its own terms, even within the larger framework.

Some have noted that Israeli academics are probably the ones most likely to be critical of the government of Israel, but that's not the point at all. Others have argued that freedom of speech or academic freedom is an issue, but that, too, isn't sufficiently understood in this context. The issue is a complex linking of factors. The meeting of scholars should be seen as a neutral activity, "pareve" in and of itself. This fact needs emphasis. On another level, we can see scholarly contact as having the potential to open doors to substantial interaction, trouble-free shared knowledge, and significant future networking. "People getting to know people" is a constructive end product – academics discussing topics of mutual interest and possibly finding mutual humanity. In the scholarly world, this model of human interaction might be competitive, but it's also about sharing information that often leads to co-operative projects. This human configuration is neither martial, nor based on conflict. It's a paradigm that should be celebrated, not boycotted.

Those who are Israeli and do research, or those who study any aspect of Israel –its land, culture and society – shouldn't be tainted by their studies or geographic location. Just like any other faculty or researcher, they should be judged by their work, not their topic. Good scholars shed light on new information or present old information in new light. Their ethnic or national background, or their home university, cannot, or should not, overshadow that determination.

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

In a discussion recently on Israel studies, a colleague wisely commented on the comparison of Israel studies with Irish studies. Prof. Michael Kenneally considered that in Irish studies, Ireland was a case study. Students and researchers learned all sorts of things about Ireland that's useful in understanding other places and situations. Similarly, Israel studies opens all sorts of possibilities for future modes of comparative analysis and interdisciplinary discovery. Divorced from biased propaganda and conflict, Israeli scholars and Israel studies become another source of information and understanding. It's not something to boycott, but rather something to seek and embrace.

Many may think the boycotters are gaining. They're not. Israeli academics are productive and professional. Israel studies is up and coming. When I began writing this column in 2003 (I can't believe it's been that long), I wrote of my pride in Concordia University coupled with my distress at the 2002 anti-Israel disturbances there. Now I write with pride as Concordia announces the launch of the Azrieli Institute of Israel Studies, which will be an incomparable research centre, a place of honest scholarship, transparent procedures, diverse methodological and theoretical approaches, and the keenest minds in Canada and Israel.

A tempestuous Middle East relationship

It has been one the most tempestuous political relationships in the Middle East between a regional power and a superpower.

The ties that bind the United States and Syria have been and continue to be tenuous and mercurial, seething with mutual suspicion and complicated by Washington's close bonds with Israel.

Since the 1950s, the United States and Syria have alternatively co-operated and squabbled, but invariably, they have found themselves on opposite sides. The current unrest in Syria, which has led to the deaths of about 1,400 civilians and the detention of about 10,000 protesters, has exposed the latest rift in their fraught relations.

It was only five months ago that the first U.S. ambassador to Syria in five years, Robert Ford, presented his credentials to Syria's authoritarian Syrian president, Bashar Assad. Ford said that his posting to Damascus was proof of Washington's desire "to try and solve the problems between our governments." But shortly after his upbeat comment, peaceful demonstrations, inspired by the Arab Spring in Tunisia and Egypt, broke out in Syria, with Syrians calling for an end to dictatorship and demanding sweeping reforms, democracy and human rights.

By way of response, Assad promised both change and unleashed his security forces on his people. As more Syrians were killed in cities such as Latakia and Homs, the United States began expressing grave concern.

Washington deplored the "brutal repression," urged Assad to address "the legitimate aspirations of his people," condemned Syria's reported use of tanks and arbitrary arrests to crush dissent, fingered Syria for inciting a lethal confrontation on the Golan Heights on Nakba Day pitting Palestinians against Israeli soldiers, accused Syria of creating a humanitarian crisis by driving thousands of civilians into neighbouring Turkey, and suggested that the current Syrian regime has disqualified itself as a partner for Israel in forging a future peace treaty.

Beyond a tongue-lashing, the Obama administration has imposed sanctions on Assad and six other senior Syrian officials in charge of the crackdown and poured scorn on Syria's Baathist regime, which has ruled Syria with an iron hand since 1963.

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has declared that violence will not resolve the crisis, while President Barack Obama has called on Assad to lead his country to democracy or "get out of the way."

Sheldon Kirshner

in Toronto

Obama, however, has not explicitly demanded Assad's resignation, nor has he considered deploying military force to deter Syria.

Obama's caution is understandable. Syria, a bastion of Arab nationalism and a client state of the Soviet Union during the Cold War period, is extremely influential in the Middle East.

Syria wields enormous influence in Lebanon, which was mired in a 15-year civil war. Syria maintains an alliance with Iran, which is bent on extending its hegemony and seeks to acquire a nuclear arsenal. Syria supports Hezbollah and Hamas, which have waged skirmishes and wars with Israel. Syria, having been at war with Israel four times since 1948, is Israel's chief conventional adversary.

Given its role in major Mideast events, Syria is an important player. As Henry Kissinger, the former U.S. secretary of state, once said, "There can be no war in the Middle East without Egypt, but there can be no peace in the Middle East without Syria."

Kissinger made this remark in the wake of the Yom Kippur War, when he was busy trying to convince Assad's late father, Hafez, to sign a disengagement accord with Israel. Kissinger's observation, though perceptive in 1973, is not necessarily true today, having been overtaken by a series of seminal developments like the Oslo accords and the Gaza war. Yet Syria is still a force to be reckoned with, and policymakers who ignore it do so at their peril.

Cognizant of Syria's pivotal role in the region, and generally interested in building bridges to Muslim world, Obama assumed the presidency with the intention of resetting the United States' testy bilateral relations with the Syrians.

Opting for a policy of engagement rather than one of confrontation, Obama proceeded from the assumption that his predecessor, George W. Bush, had erred in attempting to isolate Syria. Obama argued that Bush had neither weaned Syria away from Iran nor encouraged Syria to make peace with Israel.

Under Bush, U.S.-Syrian relations gradually deteriorated. In the aftermath of 9-11, Syria, branded as a state sponsor of terrorism by previous U.S. governments, offered the United States a measure of co-operation in the war on terror.

But after Bush accused Syria of allowing foreign fighters to cross its territory to join the postwar insurgency in Iraq, Washington imposed sanctions on Damascus. In 2005, Washington, accusing Syria of masterminding the assassination of Lebanon's prime minister, Rafik Hariri, withdrew its ambassador in Damascus.

The frost that settled over Washington's relationship with Damascus was hardly unprecedented.

In 1957, the American envoy in Syria was told to leave after the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency was implicated in a coup to topple Syria's president. During the Six Day War, Syria severed diplomatic relations with the United States. Relations were resumed in 1974, only to sour yet again after Syria derailed a U.S.-backed peace accord Israel and Lebanon had signed in May 1983.

American-Syrian relations hit a nadir in December 1983, when U.S. Marine barracks in Beirut were bombed. Suspecting a Syrian role in the deadly attack, U.S. aircraft and battleships pounded Syrian military sites in Lebanon. In 1986, Washington imposed sanctions on Syria and recalled its ambassador after accusing the Syrians of trying to plant a bomb on an El Al airliner.

Relations improved in the early 1990s, when Syria joined an anti-Iraq coalition of Arab states designed to unseat Saddam Hussein and when Syria permitted Jews to emigrate freely. But with Hariri's assassination, the tenor and tone of U.S.-Syrian relations darkened.

After Obama won the presidency, he dispatched U.S. diplomats and politicians to Damascus for fence-mending talks and invited Syrian officials to Washington. These contacts unfolded against a tableau of festering tensions. Syria claimed that U.S. policy in the Mideast, particularly its support of Israel, was misguided, while the United States warned that the flow of Syrian weapons to Hezbollah was destabilizing. Nonetheless, the United States restored relations by sending an ambassador to Damascus.

But Robert Ford's presence in Syria has not yielded the desired results. Syria's alliance with Iran and Hezbollah remains strong. Syria and Israel have yet to resume negotiations (which were broken off in 2008). And now that Syria has killed more than 1,000 of its citizens, Obama must be wondering whether his high-minded policy of engagement is really working. It can only succeed if Assad becomes a genuine reformer. But at the moment, he is mainly killing protesters demanding basic rights and trying to preserve his police state regime.

BAC2Fashion unites young adults, seniors

More than 300 people recently came together for a night of fun and fashion that will ultimately help build connections between young people and seniors.

BAC2Fashion – Fashion Forward: A Look BAC was presented by the Birthright Israel Alumni Community (BAC) and Magen Boys Entertainment. The charity fashion and dance show on June 16 at Artscape Wychwood Barns raised $35,000 for the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's seniors initiatives.

Designers on board included Erin Kleinberg, Jay Godfrey, EDIT by Jeanne Beker, Laura Fine, Shenkin West and Over the Rainbow. The trendy and stylish fashions were modelled by 35 young adults from the Toronto Jewish community.

This year's show celebrated the long-standing Jewish impact on the fashion world, dating back to the immigrant pedlars and the shmatte industry. It recognized "those deep-seated roots, as well as the continued presence of Jewish designers," said Jessica Taylor, an event chair, along with Raquel Binder, Julie Goldstein and Lisa Steele.

Since last year's event, Taylor said, BAC2Fashion has evolved. "What has changed with BAC2Fashion 2011 is how we have taken it upon ourselves over the past months to actively live our cause."

The BAC2Fashion team ran a Passover seder and a Sunday schmooze that brought together Jewish seniors and young adults. "These efforts serve to build true connections and a mutual admiration between the generations. BAC2Fashion has become more than just a fashion show."

Funds raised will go toward UJA programming for vulnerable Jewish seniors living below the poverty line or in isolation, Taylor said. "We hope that the increase in awareness we created will lead to greater, continual funding for seniors initiatives over the coming years."

Taylor said the cause is not often talked about or recognized, despite the fact that seniors are the largest at-risk group in the Jewish community. "Though many of us have enjoyed great relationships with our grandparents, we must recognize that countless seniors do not have the support they need to live healthy, fulfilling and engaged lives."

The federation supports vital initiatives including Meals on Wheels, Healthy at Home and programs that offer seniors emergency assistance, counselling and essential provisions.

"There is a lot we can do as young adults to help seniors who may lack connections to a larger network of support and resources, and we hope that BAC2Fashion will bring attention to this need."

BAC2Fashion allows young adults to work together to create positive change, Taylor said. "It's important to provide young adults with an outlet for giving back to the community and becoming active members in it. Fashion is something to which the younger generation can connect and provides a common thread to link the generations."

Fund helps provide financial security

"By [receiving money] for medications not covered by OHIP, one survivor in the early stages of Alzheimer's disease was able to slow the progression of her illness, and continue to live independently," Farber said.

"Another man was given the wheelchair he needed to get around independently in his nursing home, and [one woman] would have had nowhere to live after being discharged from a lengthy stay in hospital without the financial support from Circle of Care. They paid for space in a retirement home and helped her find appropriate long-term housing."

Farber said it's our responsibility to ensure that Holocaust survivors can live out their final years with dignity.

"They have the right to financial security, support for their health and wellness, and opportunities for social interaction that take into account their unique needs."

Herzl's dream comes to life at Baycrest

Laura Fixman
Intern

A collection of Theodor Herzl memorabilia could have a huge impact on Baycrest clients, its owner, David Matlow, says, because they remember a time before Israel existed and many of them were personally involved in the state's creation.

The exhibit, The Dream Fulfilled: Theodor Herzl and the Jewish State, will be at Baycrest until April 2012. Project and museum co-ordinator Aviva Babins saw part of Matlow's collection at Beth Tzedec Congregation and knew she had to bring it to Baycrest.

"This is the kind of show that affects everyone," Babins said. "It will trigger a different memory in different people."

Matlow said he has such a large collection of Herzl memorabilia because although Herzl's idea of a Jewish state wasn't new, he was the one who could inspire people and make his dream a reality. Matlow added that he hopes his collection will remind people how remarkable it is that there is an Israel.

"It's the most unlikely and preposterous idea anyone ever had, but it happened," he said.

Matlow's interest in Herzl began with his committed Zionist family. His grandparents lived in Israel, and he had admired a picture of Herzl they had on their wall. When his grandmother died in 1991, he got the picture, which became the first of the more than 2,000 items in his collection.

One of his favourite items is a postcard from the First Zionist Congress in 1897, addressed to friends in Toronto. He also likes the carnet de bal, which is like an autograph book, that belonged to Fanny Wolfsohn and was signed by all the prominent Zionists of the time, including Herzl.

The exhibit begins with large panels explaining what Herzl did, which Babins said contextualizes the whole thing. It is then organized in chronological order, beginning with the First Zionist Congress, and including Herzl's books, newspaper articles and souvenirs created with his likeness. In the centre of the exhibit is a portrait of Herzl done in Rubik's cubes by a local Toronto artist.

Babins said it's important to incorporate local themes into Baycrest exhibits, and it's important to engage the intellect of Baycrest clients.

"I'm here to improve quality of life," Babins said. "In a setting like this it's important to bring culture in for people who aren't able to go out to museums."

In his first few days at the exhibit, Matlow said people came up to him to say that his collection was very moving and had them in tears. He thinks this happens because people come to realize that Herzl accomplished so much in nine years, but didn't get to see his dream fulfilled. He died in 1904.

"It's such a powerful story," Matlow said. "There is tremendous confusion about the history of the State of Israel, and this exhibit tells the complete story more effectively than reading a book."

He said he continued collecting because of Herzl's message that anything you dream is possible. Herzl's dream is not yet complete, however, because he dreamed of a state at peace, Matlow added.

"This exhibit makes people think about what Israel means to them and it is up to the next generation to continue the dream Herzl started," Matlow said.

"Perhaps the magic of the State of Israel – and the miracle of it – has been lost in the news of conflict."

The exhibit ends with letters from Zionist organizations around the world next to the flag of the country they represent. Matlow said this is perfect because what made Herzl successful was the fact that he could inspire people worldwide to continue to pursue his dream.

"It's not that Herzl did this on his own," Matlow said. "He was engaging enough for people to believe in the dream and that's why people are still interested."

The Dream Fulfilled is open to the public. For more information, contact Aviva Babins at ababins@baycrest.org.

Being Jewish in the Canadian Forces

Laura Fixman
Intern

Captain Michael Fitzerman said that being a Jew in the Canadian Forces didn't make his experience different from that of anyone else.

Fitzerman joined the army in 2001. At the time he was studying physics at the University of Toronto, and he completed his training during the summer months. He became a part of the Royal Canadian Dragoons, an armoured regiment, and while he was stationed in Afghanistan, he was involved in training the Afghan army.

"They knew I was there to help them, and they appreciated the help," said Fitzerman, who is currently stationed at the Canadian Forces base in Petawawa, Ont.

Fitzerman, who spoke at Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Toronto last week, said he enjoys sharing his positive experiences in the army. A synagogue member, Fitzerman was asked to speak because Shaar Shalom Brotherhood president David Kestleman wanted other members to get a realistic picture of what Canadians are doing in Afghanistan.

Captain Michael Fitzerman

"It will show them what it's really like out there, and that it's different than what's in the media," Kestleman said.

When training Afghan soldiers, Fitzerman didn't immediately let it be known that he was Jewish, because he thought it would jeopardize his safety, he said. He eventually told the soldiers he knew well and was surprised to find they treated him better after that.

"They were curious and asked a lot of questions about religion," he said. "Most of them had never met a Jew before."

When asked by an audience member if he knows how many other Jews are in the Canadian Forces, Fitzerman replied that he doesn't know, because like most people, he doesn't ask. He said that in the army, religion doesn't matter.

"You're there to do a job regardless of race or creed," he said.

He added that in army life it's common to make fun of everyone for everything, but that any racist or antisemitic remarks are dealt with in the strictest possible manner and are considered a career ender.

"They hold people in the military to a greater moral standard," Fitzerman said.

While it is possible to get Jewish holidays off in the army, he said that he never took any, as that would mean that he wouldn't be able to take other statutory holidays. He added that soldiers who have a higher rank than his are allowed to take Jewish holidays without penalty.

He also said that he never took Jewish holidays because he believed in the philosophy of mission, soldier, self. He would put his mission above everything, and as a captain, he would focus on his soldiers after that. Doing anything for himself would come last.

Although Fitzerman is a radio specialist, while he was stationed in Afghanistan he had to work in infantry, operations and intelligence.

"Because we're a small army, everyone has to be good at everything," he said.

Israeli and Jewish identity in Canada

Many Israeli immigrants in Canada wonder if Israeli identity and values can be retained in a non-Israeli environment? We are trying our best to preserve our Israeli identity, and as parents, we are trying to raise "Israeli" children in our new, entirely Canadian milieu.

But what are the prospects?

Will we as Israelis eventually assimilate into the broader Jewish identity? Will future generations of Israelis in Canada develop their own Canadian identity with or without a Jewish component?

In January 2011, the first-ever conference of Israelis Abroad took place in Toronto. One of the speakers was Gidi Greenstein, the founder and president of the Israeli-based Reut Institute, which supports strategic planning by the State of Israel in fields vital to its future security and prosperity.

According to Greenstein, connecting immigrant Israeli children to Jewish values and tradition offers the best chance for preserving Israeli identity. "Judaism has proved a remarkable survival capability for nearly 2,000 years through difficult times and challenges," he said. "The core values of Judaism are a combination of religious, traditional and daily elements that have proved themselves throughout history."

Greenstein said that the modern Israeli identity is different than the modern Jewish one. The experience of the secular Israeli in Israel is based on language, military service and modern culture that are unique to the State of Israel.

"When looking at the descendants of Israelis who left Israel decades ago, we see a strong erosion in the Israeli identity. To the generation born outside Israel, the Israeli identity comprises only stories of a place where their grandparents or parents came from, along with bits of cultural experiences and nothing else," he said.

"Descendants of Israelis who do not find a connection to Judaism have a high probability of simply joining the local culture. From here to complete assimilation, the path is short."

The main immigration wave from Israel to Canada began a few decades ago. A major wave arrived during the 1980s, and another in the first decade of this century.

It is easy to identify the Israeli "fingerprint" in the Toronto area, which is mainly north of Steeles Avenue. One first notices the culinary aspect of the fingerprint. Israeli restaurants with Hebrew menus and Hebrew-speaking staff are commonplace. Indeed, the falafel and hummus are quite good. Most of the supermarkets sell products imported from Israel.

Hebrew is everywhere. You hear it and see it on street signs, shop windows, in offices, on Israeli radio, in newspapers, in Israeli theatre and on the Israeli TV channel.

The attitude of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is supportive and welcoming. Many Israelis have found positions in Jewish organizations in the Toronto area, and their influence can be felt in many aspects of community life. The most significant is in education.

Israeli teachers are on staff at Toronto-area day schools. The teachers bring Israeli culture to local Jewish children.

Five years ago, the Israeli school Kachol-Lavan was established. Some of the children who attend Kachol-Lavan also participate in the only Israeli scouts program in Canada, Tzofim, Shevet Hermon.

Israeli daycare centres are also ubiquitous. The proliferation of Israeli involvement in the Toronto area may actually challenge Greenstein's theory. Israelis here number in the tens of thousands. It is possible that a critical mass has been formed. This critical mass, with wide cultural activities, may succeed in preserving the individual and collective Israeli identity among the young generation.

Ironically, families that were secular in Israel find themselves more connected to Judaism in the Diaspora. Some Israelis go to synagogues, wishing to preserve their identity and feel more connected. Some celebrate Shabbat evening with Kiddush. Many Israeli homes observe kashrut and celebrate Jewish holidays.

We live in a world that is changing rapidly. Vast amounts of data are instantly communicated to far corners of the world. The younger generation is exposed more than any other before to endless cultural, language and other stimuli. But its members are also looking for an identity, no less than their parents are.

There is no unequivocal answer to the question of how Israeli immigrants and their children will preserve their identity. Or what that identity will be.

Most likely, we will all be wise in retrospect.

Reena in the News

Pathways South

Reena Pathways is a program for young adults with developmental disabilities who are in transition from attending school to learning to take on adult activities and lifestyles. Located in Hillel's student centre, the Wolfond Centre on the University of Toronto campus, the participants are part of the scene with other students their own age.

Pathways is a day program which targets life skills such as cooking, pedestrian safety, and job readiness. It offers recreational programs, such as swimming at the Miles Nadal JCC, and a friendly social group for young adults living downtown. The participants give back to the community by volunteering at local social service agencies such as the Food Bank and the Scott Mission, while gaining on-the-job experience and learning transferable skills.

Brett's Story

Brett is a young man in his 20's who has attended Pathways for three years. He lives in a supportive independent-living apartment, sings in a choir, and is an aspiring actor. By working as a volunteer at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre reception desk, he built the skills and the work experience which gave him the confidence to attempt new things.

One thing that he wanted very much was a passport. The pathways staff guided him through all the steps; the application, guarantors, and proof of citizenship, until finally he had the passport. His pride in accomplishing this complicated process is remembered by all who were involved and was a highlight for Brett.

Then he was on to another challenge. He applied to Project Works, a government program which pairs job seekers with coaches to search for jobs. Along with staff support, Brett created a resume, solicited references, and worked hard on interview skills. He proved to Project Works that he has the skills to find a job and was accepted into the program.

Brett regularly comes back to Pathways and keeps in touch with his friends there. They all wish him every success in the future.

Does it really need a hechsher?

Rabbi Tsvi Heber

Keeping kosher has never been easier for kosher shoppers. Statistics show that kosher-certified products now represent a whopping one-third of all products for sale at American and Canadian supermarkets. Truly astounding is the range of products that bear a kosher symbol. While the need for kosher certification of meat and most processed foods is self-evident, kosher symbols are even known to appear on "intrinsically kosher" items such as raw grains and spring water. What's more startling is that companies are increasingly seeking kosher certification for cleaning products and even paper towels. While there are certainly many more kosher consumers today than in years past, the surge in the variety of kosher products has more to do with the power of "kosher."

One of my colleagues recently visited a soap manufacturer. "Rabbi," said the company representative, "we need to get our laundry detergent kosher certified." My colleague replied, "Sir, laundry detergent does not require kosher certification. Kosher is for food!" "You're making a mistake, rabbi. To consumers, kosher means quality, and laundry detergent should be kosher, too!"

Indeed, a recent survey proved that only 15 per cent of people buy kosher because they're Jewish. Other reasons included quality, safety, and people who are vegetarians, vegan or lactose intolerant. These consumers are driving today's all-encompassing kosher market.

While kosher consumers surely reap the benefits of this expanded kosher market, it has also caused confusion. Certifying intrinsically kosher products creates an impression that such products aren't kosher unless they're certified. The reality is detergent obviously doesn't require kosher certification, nor do many other foods, even some processed ones. Products such as extra virgin olive oil, frozen blueberries, dried dates, unflavoured beer and coffee, salt and pepper are kosher without certification. This knowledge is critical to travellers and to the rest of us when kosher certified products aren't available or are more expensive.

Rabbinic Reflections

On the other hand, kosher consumers may unknowingly purchase uncertified products that they assume to be kosher, when in fact they're not. We see kosher consumers buy from uncertified coffee shops and ice cream parlours. While some products are made from exclusively kosher ingredients, others aren't. The use of non-kosher utensils and equipment is a significant issue.

I have many stories to tell – including discovering a popular frozen yogurt parlour erroneously telling its customers that their flavours were certified kosher when, in fact, they weren't. Recently, representatives of the Kashruth Council of Canada met with a franchisee of a large ice cream chain. She was interested in kosher certification, because many of her customers want strictly kosher products and she's not always able to provide them, so she turned to the Kashruth Council.

In summary, food manufacturing today is complex, and the much-sought-after kosher designation helps consumers stay informed.

Rabbi Heber is director of community kosher operations for the Kashruth Council of Canada.

Tribute to a mentor

Regardless of their personal piety or lack thereof, Jewish law affirms that an almost super-human level of respect be shown to our parents. What is less well known is that, in theory at least, one must display even greater honour to our teachers, "for our parents bring us to this world and our teachers bring us to the world to come."

Jewish law even records a practice that students are to observe many of the practices of shiva upon the death of their (primary) teacher. This article will appear on the 12th yahrzeit of my mother, Ruth Kelman. One week later, our family will observe the second yahrzeit of my father, Rabbi Joseph Kelman. I and my sister and brother were most fortunate to have such wonderful parents/teachers who get much of the credit for whatever we may have achieved.

But I would like to focus on the recent passing of one of my teachers, Rabbi Aaron Levine. Rabbi Levine was an accomplished Torah scholar and received rabbinic ordination not just in ritual law, but in commercial and civil law, an extremely rare accomplishment. Elected to Phi Beta Kappa at Brooklyn College, Rabbi Levine received his PhD in economics from New York University and chaired the department of economics at Yeshiva University for many years.

Perhaps more than any other, he "invented" the field of Jewish business ethics, bringing his tremendous expertise in economic theory as a tool for analysis of ancient talmudic texts and using Jewish texts to help shed light on economic theories. Through this synthesis, he shed light – both economic and moral – on the most complex of business transactions in the modern marketplace. At the same time, he was the dedicated and beloved rabbi of the Young Israel of Avenue J in Brooklyn.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Some 30 years ago, I had the privilege to enrol in his course on comparative economic systems. Ostensibly, this fascinating course was a blueprint for how a Torah-based economic system might be put into place in, say, the State of Israel. The course served as the basis for his first book, Free Enterprise and Jewish Law. This was followed by Economics and Jewish Law, Economic Public Policy and Jewish Law, Case Studies in Jewish Business Ethics, and Moral Issues of the Marketplace in Jewish Law.

A quick perusal of these books – and I highly recommend them all – will introduce a reader to a discussion of such topics as strikes and unions, taxation policies, pricing of pharmaceuticals, ethical investing, corporate takeovers, teacher evaluations, layoffs, marketing, whistleblowing, telemarketing – to name but a few.

In addition to his encyclopedic knowledge and keen analytical skills, he was one of the finest people I have ever met. Humble to a fault, unassuming and soft-spoken, he took a deep interest in his students. On those occasions when I would call to discuss a moral quandary with him, he greeted me with a warmth and concern befitting a close friend.

It's no exaggeration to say that it was Rabbi Levine who kindled my interest in the field of money and morality. The articles I am able to present are a result of the influence and inspiration from this wonderful person. May his memory be for a blessing.

Religious Jews and Israeli government decisions

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

Gadi Taub's Hebrew book, The Settlers, has been translated into English at a propitious time. In recent weeks, the possibility of a unilateral declaration of a Palestinian state has been widely discussed, along with U.S. President Barack Obama's suggestion that the 1967 borders should be the basis for any agreement between Israel and the Palestinians. Interest in the fate of the Jews living in the territories is high. (The "territories" in this article refers to the area called, depending on your politics, either Yehudah and Shomron, occupied Palestine, or the occupied West Bank).

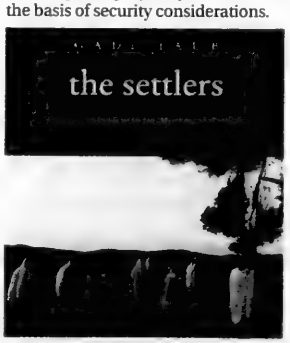
Taub, who teaches political science at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, does not support the movement to settle Jews in the territories. But he is not an indiscriminate opponent, either. His book concentrates on the ideological national-religious leaders of the settlers, saying almost nothing about the tens of thousands of secular and haredi Jews who have moved beyond the Green Line because of economic or lifestyle considerations. Taub realizes that even among the leaders of the movement that initiated and promoted settlement, Gush Emunim ("Bloc of the Faithful"), there are a variety of ideological perspectives on such crucial issues as the value of the state and its government or the relative importance of religion and state.

What I found most interesting about the book was the author's thesis that various events in the last 40 years have led to significant shifts in the argumentation of those who support settlements. Taub retells the story of the conflict surrounding one settlement in the 1970s, Elon Moreh, to explain this development.

A group of religious settlers repeatedly attempted to establish Elon Moreh near the biblical city of Shechem (known by Arabs as Nablus) and were removed time and again by the Israeli government. (Taub notes that settlers who defy the government often portray themselves as continuing the spirit of the early Zionists, who often flouted the law in order to create Zionist facts on the ground. Taub rejects the comparison: breaking the law of the democratically elected government of the Jewish state is very different from breaking the law of the British mandatory regime.) Finally, after a change in government, the Elon Moreh group was allowed to settle near Shechem, on land that had belonged to Arabs but was now expropriated by the new government. Arabs and members of the Jewish left appealed to the Israel High Court of Justice, arguing that the expropriation was illegal. The government countered that the expropriation was justified since the settlement would improve security. The court rejected the government's case, saying that while security needs could justify expropriations and settlements, no reasonable argument could be made that this specific Jewish enclave in the middle of a densely populated Palestinian area actually increased anyone's security.

Curiously, as Taub highlights, the brief submitted to the court by Rabbi Menachem Felix, one of the founders of Elon Moreh, may have undermined the government's case. Rabbi Felix argued that security considerations were irrelevant to the discussion. He preferred to argue that the settlers were simply acting on the divinely ordained obligation of Jews to settle in all parts of the Land of Israel.

Taub argues that Rabbi Felix's approach had been the central argument of Gush Emunim for its first 10 years. Once the High Court of Justice rejected the argument out of hand (and once the court of public opinion in Israel also failed to respond to this religious claim), the settler movement took a sharp rhetorical turn, beginning to justify its actions on the basis of security considerations.



Since Taub is a political scientist, much of the book deals with the thorny question of the settlers' attitudes to the state and its sovereignty. The settler movement originated 40 years ago in the religious-intellectual world of Yeshivat Mercaz Harav Kook, headed by Rabbi Zvi Yehudah Kook, the son of the famous pre-state chief rabbi, Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook. (I was a student in that yeshiva during those crucial years.) The younger Rabbi Kook strongly believed in the religious value of the state. He saw its miraculous expansion in 1967 as an important step in an unfolding messianic drama. "Divine politics," is what Rabbi Zvi Yehudah called it. But the problem for Rabbi Yehudah and his followers was how to relate to leaders of the state who did not subscribe to this messianic worldview and who made decisions about Israel's policies based on their understanding of Israel's security needs or, as happens in every country, based on their understanding of what policies would get them re-elected.

Paradoxically, the religious value that the settlers imputed to the state made it difficult for them to accept politics as usual when it came to decisions about its future. Occasionally, this conflict led to a small number of settler rabbis calling for civil disobedience. Other settler leaders have cooled their enthusiasm for the state, while remaining staunchly committed to the land.

But Taub does offer some hope when he describes settler leaders and sympathizers who are now developing more mature attitudes to the state and its government. Rabbi Yuval Cherlow, who used to live and teach in the Golan Heights, has written that the values of sovereignty and Jewish political independence are more important than settlement. Rabbi Yoel Bin-Nun, who has lived in the territories for most of his life, has written that a rabbi who rules on matters of state because he is knowledgeable about halachic matters, such as Shabbat or kosher food, "is like a dentist who begins to perform heart and brain surgery only because he is called doctor." These two rabbis believe that all citizens of the state, including rabbis, must defer to its experts and elected legislators.

It is not so simple for religious Jews to defer to governmental decisions on "Jewish" issues if they are not consistent with the teachings of Judaism as they see it. Religion teaches people to stand fast and defend holy values. Politics, though, is the art of the possible. For the last 2,000 years, we have not had Jewish governments ruling on Jewish issues, so the question of the attitudes of rabbis to such governments was academic. But it is heartening to see now the development of a small cadre of Israeli rabbis who value the Torah, the land and the state and yet who realize that, in the 21st century, a state has to follow standard political procedures, as unattractive as they might sometimes be, when developing national policies and priorities.

Tanach specialist makes lessons interesting and interactive

When pressed, Karen Sitnik will admit that finding time to do everything she wants to do with her students can be challenging.

But, as a rule, the middle school Torah and Navi teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools says she tries to be "very proactive, so I don't have the challenges [that often come with the job]." To that end, she works at making her lessons "interesting and creative," incorporating games, technology and interactive activities.

By Frances Kraft

For a recent project on kashrut, she had students create a virtual kosher kitchen with a demonstration aimed at a new chef working in a kosher restaurant.

"It's practical, it's visual and it's interactive," she said.

She has also used a class blog to have students discuss issues they're learning about.

Sitnik said the technological aspect to her lessons doesn't have to do with the fact that her husband, Rabbi Ari Sitnik, is the school's IT consultant.

The couple are the parents of four boys – a 14-year-old, an eight-year-old, and four-year-old twins.

Their oldest son was born eight months before she began her teaching career. She has been at Associated the whole time and has taught every grade, from 1 through 8.

An alumna of York University's Jewish teacher education program, Sitnik, 37, also completed her M.Ed. there a couple of years ago, working on the degree part-time. Her thesis topic was "Teaching Tanach in elementary grades." Currently, she's working on a new Torah curriculum for the school, leading a group of colleagues in the project.

A native of Montreal who lived in Orillia for a short time as a young child, Sitnik has lived in Toronto since she was six years old. She attended Bialik Hebrew Day School before starting high school at what is now the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Her last two years of high school were spent at Ulpanat Orot, after her father – and then she and other family members – became observant. Before entering York University, she spent a year at a Lubavitch seminary in Israel.

Sitnik said she always loved working with children,

but she also considered a career in medicine, and kept her options open while she was in high school.

She has taught general studies as well as Jewish studies, but said that "there's something about Jewish studies I love… it's closer to my heart."

To balance full-time teaching with her busy home life, Sitnik has to be "very organized," she said. "If I don't shop on Wednesday, I can't cook on Thursday and have Shabbos food on Friday. It just helps when you know the steps and work backwards."

She teaches her students to approach their work the same way, figuring out what they need to do to achieve their goals.

As well, Sitnik tweaks her lessons to meet the varied needs of her students, whether they are visual learners or learn better in other ways.

SHABBAT TIME

The junior/senior kindergarten class at Temple Sinai Nursery School shared Shabbat after they baked challahs. They also enjoyed making and eating chicken soup with matzah balls, noodles and carrots. Absurd story dogs news media

Headlines in some of the world's major media outlets on June 17 were indeed shocking: "Jerusalem rabbis condemn dogs to death by stoning'" (BBC News); "Jewish court sentences dog to death by stoning" (Agence-France Press); "Shocking sentence: Jewish court condemns dog to death by stoning" (Time magazine).

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The BBC story declared: "A Jewish rabbinical court condemned to death by stoning a stray dog it feared was the reincarnation of a lawyer who insulted its judges, reports say... The animal is said to have escaped before the sentence was carried out."

Sensational, but, as it turned out, totally erroneous. It never happened. The only newsworthy story here is the egg left on the face of the BBC, AFP and Time. (No mainstream Canadian media picked it up.)

How did an innocuous occurrence and a non-story – a dogcatcher was called when a dog wandered into a Jerusalem courtroom – get transformed and so egregiously misreported in the mainstream media?

In an attempt to find the answer, the June 21 Christian Science Monitor delved into this media embarrassment.

Apparently the BBC, etc. took their lead from Ynet, the website for the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot, which reported some version of the story. The Ynet report (it's no longer available) did, however, carry a denial from the head of the court that the so-called ruling took place. This alone should have been a warning to journalists to check the facts to ensure accuracy, which should be the first responsibility of the media.

According to the Christian Science Monitor, Ynet itself relied on a story from a small paper tied to the haredi community, which in turn based its report on an unnamed person who was supposedly at the court. In short, this "story" should not have been picked up by Ynet, and then certainly not by major international news organizations which, within days, had to issue corrections.

Yet even the BBC's correction of June 20 was prefaced by a statement that in its own way compounds the shoddiness of its June 17 story. "This report was based on sources usually regarded by the BBC as reliable," it declared, thereby confirming its own laziness and negligence for failing to check out what on the surface was absurd.

Reflecting on the different standards that apply in academe versus journalism about establishing truth, media critic Eric Alterman (an academic and journalist) was particularly blunt. Alterman wrote: "Journalists... usually treat anything as true if someone in a position of ostensible authority is willing to say it, even anonymously (and if no one is going to sue over it). The accuracy of anyone's statement, particularly if that person is a public official, is often deemed irrelevant" (Academe Online, May-June, 2011).

Responsible, diligent journalists – and there are indeed many of them – would no doubt take strong exception to Alterman's characterization. But what he says certainly applies to the BBC and others in this sorry case.

Noteworthy:

In an "analysis" piece for cbc.ca (June 21) titled "The hypocrisy that is the West's response to Syria," Neil Macdonald had some interesting things to say about double-standards:

"I wrote to a leader of one of the pro-Palestinian groups last week, asking what his followers are planning for ordinary Syrians. Will there be an aid flotilla of the sort even now being planned once again for Gazans? Perhaps some sort of attempt to confront the Syrian navy?

"The answer: 'We focus on Israel and Palestine. But we have put out statements backing what the peoples of the Middle East are doing to resist and replace the regimes that are oppressing them.'

"Really? I haven't seen many. The fact is everyone seems to have a reason not to rage against Bashar al-Assad and his killers... And the West's ubiquitous social justice activists, the ones who fill reporters' e-mail queues with daily denunciations of Israel or western imperialism have no history at all of going up against Arab dictatorships (quite the opposite in some cases, I'd have to say)."

Ex-Yale scholar defends antisemitism initiative

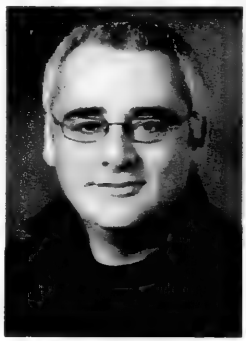
Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — It may have cost him a prestigious post at an Ivy League university, but Montreal native Charles Asher Small believes he was right in drawing scholarly attention to the dangerous antisemitism of radical Islam and the Iranian regime.

Small is the founder and director of the Yale Initiative for the Interdisciplinary Study of Antisemitism (YIISA), whose disbanding after five years by the university has been controversial and, despite an international outcry from Jewish groups and academics, is now irrevocable.

YIISA, which was the first university-based research centre of its kind in North America, will wind up at the end of July because Yale said it had not met its academic expectations, either in its research or instruction.

Meanwhile, on June 20, the university announced the launch of the Yale Program for the Study of Antisemitism, which will not be headed by Small.



Charles A. Small

Scholars for Peace in the Middle East, a group that combats anti-Israel propaganda on college campuses in the United States, suggested Yale had caved in to pressure from Iran, some Palestinians and others who were angered by YIISA's increasing focus on Islamic antisemitism and its threat to Israel. Others felt YIISA was engaging in advocacy more than academics.

Small agrees. "We broke a taboo in talking about radical Islam and antisemitism, about how things have changed in the Middle East since the 1990s, how the Arab-Israeli conflict has moved to one of religious ideology, how it has turned genocidal," he said in an interview.

"It's one thing to study dead Jews, but to try to understand and to strategize in order to keep those alive today secure is another... We were trailblazers."

He thinks Yale had to respond to "the overwhelming pressure" and set up a revamped program on the subject.

The American Jewish Committee and Anti-Defamation League (ADL) also deplored the closing of YIISA, but the ADL is now supportive of Yale's establishment of a new program to study antisemitism.

Small rejects Yale's public statement that YIISA scholars had not published enough papers in top-tier academic journals or attracted sufficient students. He points to a publication record that includes eight books, 43 papers in peer-reviewed journals, and "countless" articles, as well as the number of "esteemed" visiting professors and graduate and post-doctoral students who have been associated with YIISA.

Last August, YIISA held what Small describes as the largest ever academic conference of its kind on antisemitism, entitled "Global Antisemitism: A Crisis of Modernity."

He notes that the report of the review committee on YIISA remains confidential. Neither Small nor any member of YIISA governance has seen it, which, he said, is not normal.

Small, who holds a PhD from Oxford University and did post-doctoral research at the Université de Montréal, has been outspoken in his contention that "the radical form of Islamicism has at its core a hatred of Jews" and that scholars can play an active role in combating antisemitism, hand in hand with human rights advocates and policy makers.

In fact, he's convinced they have a "moral obligation."

He wonders if history might have been different if in 1935 scholars had examined European antisemitism in the same pragmatic way that YIISA has. He believes Iran is preparing "another Holocaust."

In his first written statement on the matter, concurrent with Yale's announcement of its new antisemitism program, Small said: "It became evident that YIISA and Yale University have different visions and approaches to the study of antisemitism... YIISA, however, is committed to critical, engaged scholarship with a broader approach to the complex and, at times, controversial context of global antisemitism."

Small is hoping to link up with another academic institution that will support his approach, and possibly work with some of the academics at the new Yale program.

Before his association with Yale, Small founded the Institute for the Study of Global Antisemitism and Policy, which still exists, at least, on paper. He is also the president of the International Association for the Study of Antisemitism, which was launched at the YIISA conference last year.

YIISA had a strong Canadian connection. Montreal member of Parliament and McGill University law professor Irwin Cotler chaired its academic committee. Irving Abella of York University, Catherine Chatterley of the University of Manitoba, and, from McGill, Gil Troy, Morton Weinfeld and Raphael Fischler are listed as members of the international academic board of directors.

Cotler could not be reached for comment.

Historian wants to save European shuls

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Warning that synagogues in isolated Jewish communities in central and eastern Europe are in grave danger of disappearing, a Canadian historian has launched a project to save them.

Janet Kerekes, a specialist in European history, started what she has dubbed the Synagogue Project earlier this year.

"It's an effort to twin synagogues in Toronto with those in central and eastern Europe, to the benefit of both parties," she explained.

Having visited synagogues in Austria, Hungary, Poland, Bulgaria and Serbia, Kerekes warns that some shuls in these countries may vanish due to what she described as "repurposing, decrepitude, underutilization and a lack of support."

Kerekes, whose parents are of Polish and Russian descent, has met with rabbis in Toronto and Europe to garner interest in her project.

"On both sides of the ocean, there are people who want to become involved," she said.

Under her proposal, abandoned synagogues would be purchased and restored. Synagogues that were put to other uses would also be purchased and converted to their original use.

In her view, Jews in Canada should reengage with their European past so that their children don't lose sight of their historical legacy.

"We are co-heirs of the synagogues that are still standing in central and eastern Europe," she said. "Jews who perished in the Holocaust and the survivors and their children are all our distant relatives.

A synagogue in Sopron, Hungary and, inset, Janet Kerekes

"Do we not owe it to them to help them maintain their Jewish way of life, whose conduit for continuity is their synagogue. Should we not reach out to these long-lost relatives and re-establish bonds with them?

"And lest we forget, we owe this to the six million Jews murdered in the Holocaust. We should take care of their surviving families. Memorials are not an adequate response."

All too often, she suggested, Jews in the Diaspora are so focused on Israel that they forget their European past.

Victimized by fascism and communism, the Jewish communities in Europe she has visited are in dire need of assistance.

"They are isolated, beleaguered, proud, stoic, fragile, self-dependent yet needy, assimilated yet very conscious of their identity and usually poorly educated, Jewishly speaking."

She added, "They can use all the help they can get."

The condition of their synagogues varies enormously.

Citing a few examples, she said, "The synagogue in Belgrade has been well restored, as has the Dohanyi synagogue in Budapest. The synagogue in Sopron, Hungary, has a reasonable exterior, but the interior is completely empty. It is only a shell. The synagogue in Papa, Hungary, is in ruins."

Last week, Kerekes embarked on another trip to Europe to advance her project. She plans to visit Jewish communities in Austria, Hungary, Ukraine, Poland and Germany.

She wants to get a sense of their needs and how they would like to engage with Jews in Toronto.

Till now, Kerekes has financed the project herself, but she hopes synagogues in Toronto and elsewhere will pitch in with an annual donation.

The project is really a continuation of her University of Toronto doctoral thesis on the failure of Jewish assimilation in 19th and 20th century Hungary.

University Press of America published her dissertation in 2005 under the title of Masked Ball at the White Cross Café: The Failure of Jewish Assimilation.

Kerekes has been a teaching assistant at Ryerson University and McMaster University. During the early 1990s, she taught secular studies at several Jewish schools in Toronto – Or HaEmet, Cheder Chabad and Eitz Chaim.

Currently, she is a private English-as-a-second language tutor.

Survivors celebrate at their own 'prom'

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Hundreds of Holocaust survivors were recently given the chance to celebrate their prom with March of the Living's 2011 high school delegation.

The Senior Prom: An Intergenerational Celebration of Life, held on June 20 at the Warehouse Event Venue in Toronto, was organized by March of the Living to blend the generations in a fun and meaningful atmosphere.

"Over 65 years later, we wanted to give Holocaust survivors the chance to celebrate their prom, as they were unable to attend their own – they were either in concentration camps or in hiding," said Elise Kayfetz, post programming co-ordinator of March of the Living.

"The unfortunate fact is that the presence of Holocaust survivors is quickly fading, and we want to be able to shine some positive focus on those survivors that are still with us today and give them a night to remember."

Under March of the Living's post programming model, Kayfetz said it is the organization's mission to ensure that the alumni transition back into the Jewish community and become strong leaders of the future.

Kayfetz and her friend, Andrea Rowan, first created the prom experience in 2005 for seniors at Shalom Village in Hamilton, Ont. Kayfetz, who is also a gerontologist, held her second version of the event in 2007 at Baycrest.

"This year, I decided to take the initiative one step further," she said. "Instead of simply making the event for Holocaust survivors who never had the chance to attend their prom, I wanted my March of the Living 2011 alumni to share this ubiquitous event with the survivors and be paired up as dates – making this a true intergenerational celebration of life."

To prepare for the event, the prom planning committee contacted UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Holocaust survivor service centres to send out invitations. The committee itself was an intergenerational mix of volunteers, including Amek Adler, a survivor.

Kayfetz said many of the survivors who were invited to the prom are living in isolation. "It's important for them to know we care about them. Holocaust survivors are getting older and passing away, so while they are here, not only should we be dancing with them, we also need to remember them and their stories."

She said the prom acts as a gateway to future programming with survivors. One of the March of the Living educational post programming options is called Legacy – An Action Plan, in which participants spend two sessions with a survivor and learn to tell their story.

"The prom is important for the survivors because they need to know we want to remember them. Younger generations give survivors hope that the light of the Jewish community will forever be ignited and bright when they are no longer here."

Kayfetz said she thinks the prom will act as a reminder to the high school students that they "need to do more with Holocaust survivors while they are here. As my mom says, they are the ones that brought us here and we owe it to them to show we care."

The evening featured music by Magen Boys Entertainment, a photo booth, a beauty bar for makeup touch-ups and boutonnieres for all survivors made by Susan Jackson.

Cotler retables 'Grandmothers for Gilad' petition

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler last week retabled a petition in Parliament on behalf of "Grandmothers for Gilad Schalit" as the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) soldier's fifth anniversary as a Hamas captive in Gaza was to be marked June 25.

First tabled last Oct. 27, the petition, conceived by York University professor emeritus Sally Zerker, calls on the Canadian government to help secure the release and repatriation of Schalit, who turns 25 at the end of August.

"The petitioners call upon the government... to insist that the Red Cross, the United Nations, and other humanitarian agencies uphold the applicable standards of international humanitarian law," Cotler said June 20 in the House of Commons as Parliament was about to rise for the summer.

That includes, he added, the right to visitation by the International Red Cross and family, and proof that he's alive.

Schalit's abduction in a cross-border raid in 2006 was illegal and he has been held "in complete isolation," Cotler told Parliament.

"This constitutes a form of torture, according to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights," New Democratic Party foreign affairs critic Paul Dewar said in an e-mail to The CJN.

The only indication of Schalit's condition has been a video message, dated September 2009, that Israel obtained by releasing 20 female Palestinian prisoners.

In the message, Schalit said he was being treated well.

Last fall, The CJN reported that Zerker, who is in her early 80s, had formed "Grandmothers for Gilad" in September 2010, comprising about 50 grandmothers who want Canada to be at the forefront of the Schalit issue in the face of virtual silence on the part of the world community.

Irwin Cotler

Zerker was motivated by an essay that appeared one month earlier in The CJN, written by her brother, Rabbi Benjamin Friedberg.

The petition had 56 signatorees when first tabled – more than twice the number needed to be presented in Parliament. Zerker galvanized the effort with the help of her blog, grandmothersforgilad.blogspot.com.

"I don't know if [my petition] will make any difference," Zerker told The CJN at the time. "But my feeling is one has to try and bring this into the international arena, [which] has not happened in the case of Gilad Schalit."

Zerker also expressed hope that the petition would spread to other countries, including France, where the Schalit family originates (there is a petition circulating on Schalit's behalf in France, but not specifically involving grandmothers).

Last week, Cotler told Parliament that the $300 million in aid Canada has promised the Palestinian Authority be linked to Schalit's basic rights being met under international law.

UIA Federations Canada gets new president

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Marc Gold, the new president of UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC), has the challenge of making Jews even in the smallest communities feel part of the national whole while streamlining the organization's top-heavy administration.

Gold, who was president of Montreal's Federation CJA from 2007 to 2009, succeeds David Engel of Toronto as lay leader of the Toronto-based organization with an admittedly cumbersome name for a two-year term.

UIAFC seeks to represent all Jews in the country who contribute to a UIA-affiliated campaign. There are 10 federations in Canada and another 40 smaller, unfederated communities, 27 in Ontario alone.

"We have to find the balance between being representative, yet workable," he said in an interview.

UIAFC has a board of more than 80 members, as well as a large executive, Gold said. That's much too big, he believes, noting that even large corporations rarely have more than 25 directors.

Gold, 61, is vice-president of Maxwell Cummings and Sons Holdings Ltd., whose president and CEO is his brother-in-law, Steven Cummings, currently chair of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA).

Gold would like UIAFC to be better known among Canadian Jews.

"UIAFC plays an important role in Canada and in representing the Canadian federations and communities internationally," said Gold. "We're able to bring a coherent Canadian perspective to the table. It gives both the largest and smallest communities a collective voice."

Its primary function is to channel a portion of the funds raised in UIA campaigns to philanthropies in Israel and to national, principally advocacy organizations, CIJA being the largest.

Canadian Jewry sends tens of millions of dollars to Israel annually, in recent years from $20 to $40 million, he said. UIAFC's decides with the Jewish Agency for Israel and Keren Hayesod how this money is spent, and a UIAFC staff in Israel oversees its distribution.

Each federation's contribution to advocacy in Canada is determined according to a formula that takes into account such factors as the community's size and the amount it raises or has the capacity to raise.

A plan for a new national advocacy organization, approved by the CIJA board in June, will integrate the roles of Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC). Details are expected to be announced by the end of the summer, said Gold, including what the new entity will be called.

At the annual general meeting June 5, where Gold was confirmed president, UIAFC decided to continue to maintain "CIJA 2.0", as it's been facetiously dubbed, as its advocacy agent.

Marc Gold

Gold, however, stressed that the organization he heads is more than the organized community's banker or accountant.

It is increasingly playing an educational role, reaching out especially to younger Jews in smaller centres, whether they live there or are students away from home. It offers leadership training to strengthen Jewish identity and a sense of community belonging.

An online program just launched already has signed up subscribers from as remote a locale as the Northwest Territories.

In affiliated communities without a federation, UIAFC actually runs the campaigns.

Although the trend over the past decades has been migration to the big cities, Gold said "tens of thousands of Jews still live in dozens of communities that may have only one synagogue or school."

He plans to visit these communities during his term, and looks forward to working with UIAFC CEO Linda Kislowicz, formerly of Montreal, whom he has known for years.

"We have to examine how we do business as an organization and be as transparent as possible," Gold said. "We must hold our partners and agents accountable and, at the same time, make sure we are responding to their needs and objectives. Are we truly representing the interests of our federations and communities? We have to make sure we are relevant."

Winnipeg federation boosts cash allocations

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Beneficiary agencies of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg received some good news from the federation board at its most recent meeting June 2: most of them will get more money this year.

The federation's annual CJA campaign raised a record $5.4 million last year – $100,000 more than the previous year. The additional $100,000 is all going to beneficiary agencies.

The federation's two major beneficiaries are the Gray Academy of Jewish Education and the Jewish Child and Family Service, and, naturally, they'll receive the largest portions of the additional money. The junior kindergarten-Grade 12 Gray Academy will get an extra $40,000, while JC&FS will receive about $28,000 more than last year.

Smaller increases will go to the Rady Jewish Community Centre ($8,500), B'nai Brith Camp ($7,500), Camp Massad ($5,000), Shalom Residences ($3,000) and Reform congregation Temple Shalom's religious school ($1,500).

The federation board also heard a report from Andrew Paller, author of a study on fundraising by North American Jewish federations. He said Winnipeg registered the highest average campaign growth from 2006 to 2009 among 13 medium-sized communities and was a leader in encouraging donations from community members younger than 45.

He also noted that professional fundraisers are more successful than lay people in getting pledges from donors in the $10,000-plus category.

One area where Winnipeg can improve however, is in encouraging federation agency board members to contribute more, Paller said.

The federation board also recognized Bob Freedman, longtime CEO of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, and chief financial officer Jack Cipilinski for their long years of service.

Freedman has been CEO for 25 years, while Cipilinski (who was unable to attend) has served as CFO for 30 years.

"It was a nice surprise and very touching," Freedman said.

Moishe House opens in Vancouver

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Canada's first Moishe House opened in Vancouver in May, with four young leaders eager to host and organize activities for the 20- and 30-something crowd.

"We're trying to reach young Jews through events that are part educational, part social," said Baruch Huberman, a native Vancouverite who is one of the residents at 536 E 20th St. in Vancouver. "The idea of Moishe House is to create a stronger community for people who may not feel comfortable or be part of any existing Jewish organization. And our activities are events-oriented, so we can attract people who have passions in the things that we do."

The Oakland, Calif.-based Moishe House organization began in 2008 and has 36 Moishe Houses around the world, including in Vienna, New Orleans, St. Louis, Beijing, Kiev, Gomel in Belarus and Chisinau in Moldova. Between four and eight new houses open each year, and all of the early Moishe Houses are still in full operation – with new residents. Each house has three to five young adults who have one thing in common: an eagerness to create a home that becomes a hub of Jewish life for their young adult peers.

According to its website, Moishe House is targeted at young adults aged 21 to 30 because "a major void has evolved in which there are almost no appropriate organized venues for post-collegiate Jews in their 20s. Moishe House was created to meet the needs of this growing demographic by cultivating a meaningful and attractive pathway from Jewish college life to Jewish family life."

The residents of Vancouver's Moishe House include Jacob Haas, an Oregon student who is working on a degree in education; Kiki Lipsett, who hails from the San Francisco Bay area and works for a community engagement and development organization, and Rotem Tal, an Israeli studying at Simon Fraser University. Huberman, 28, is completing his bachelor's degree in kinesiology.

"They've had incredible turnouts at Vancouver's Moishe House events so far," said Jeremiah Katz, a Vancouverite who was instrumental in helping to organize Moishe House in conjunction with the board of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver. Events to date have included a housewarming, a potluck Shabbat meal, a hike and a barbecue at Queen Elizabeth Park. Moishe House was recently given 21 tickets to the Jewish Film Festival, so movies are next up on the list.

Huberman said he's also been surprised at the turnout at events. "Our friends were the first people to join us, but at each event, people I've never met before have been coming. We had 16 new people for the Shabbat dinner. They come, enjoy it and bring their friends along."

Vancouver's Moishe House residents pay half of the $3,500 monthly rental fee. The rest is covered by the Jewish federation, whose donors have contributed $35,000 towards a year's operating costs for the house. The residents are given $400 each month to organize social events. For programming ideas, they draw from the Moishe House infrastructure in Oakland.

"We provide in-person training by visiting every location, and we bring all the residents together at least twice a year," Moishe House executive director David Cygielman said. "We also have a director of Jewish education and a director of repair the world programming who support contact, and a regional director who provides general support and oversight."

"We're given a lot of autonomy," Huberman said. "The location was important to the Moishe House organizers – they wanted it to be in a young, hip neighbourhood and they were looking for a mix of men and women to be residents – at least one local person and one Israeli, so we'd be able to attract as many people as possible. But there's no rules about Jewish observance."

Given the great turnout at events thus far, Katz said it's likely that Vancouver's Moishe House will continue after the first year. "The next generation is one of federation's priorities," he said. "We have a great location and a very diverse group of individuals at Moishe House. This definitely fills a gap in our community."

Cygielman said Moishe House Vancouver is doing five or six programs every month, and the head office gauges success both quantitatively and qualitatively. "We track what types of programs, how many people and how many new people come to the events. And in partnership with the Jim Joseph Foundation, we have engaged the TCC Group from New York to do qualitative evaluation to see how Moishe House impacts both residents and participants."

Huberman said being at Moishe House has been a fantastic opportunity. "It's great living here – we're able to afford a really nice house in a great neighbourhood. And if we have a passionate idea, like we want to go hiking but don't know who to go with, this is a way to make it happen. It's opened my eyes to all the potential in Vancouver that I didn't know about."

On side with Pride

Justine Apple

As executive director of Kulanu Toronto, the city's only Jewish LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender) organization, it seems fitting that I am writing a guest voice for this issue of The CJN, as we are in the midst of Pride Week. Pride Week is Toronto's foremost arts and cultural festival celebrating the lives and stories of the gay community, and it attracts more than one million people from all over the world.

Guest Voice

Pride Week climaxes with the Pride Parade this Sunday, and Kulanu Toronto is proud to be taking its spot in the lineup, complete with our very own float and live band.

Last year, we were incredibly proud to have more than 500 Jewish marchers, both straight and gay, in our contingent. Some of them included members from organizations such as Canadian Jewish Congress, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canada-Israel Committee, Hillel of Greater Toronto and the Simon Wiesenthal Center. We also had marchers from Temple Sinai, Congregation Darchei Noam, First Narayever Congregation, Holy Blossom Temple, Temple Emanu-el, Beth Tzedec Congregation and Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School. It was thrilling to watch our huge, colourful delegation march down Yonge Street with Rainbow, Israeli, and Canadian flags.

Many of you joined us at last Pride to counter the controversial anti-Israel messaging of Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA). Your presence evidenced your support for Israel as a gay rights leader and as a country much like Canada that celebrates a diverse and dynamic LGBT community. Together, we marched for the truth. Together, we showed QuAIA that we will not back down and allow hateful, divisive messaging to hijack a parade that is meant to be vibrant and inclusive.

Justine Apple

This Sunday, we invite you to march with "all of us" ("kulanu" in Hebrew) again. We look forward to having members of Canadian Jewish Congress, Temple Sinai, Holy Blossom, Darchei Noam and JSpaceCanada marching with us. We acknowledge the continuing guidance and support from Congress, as well as the support this year from Senator Linda Frum.

Although QuAIA has agreed to stay out of the parade, they will be hosting an independent Pride Week event to raise awareness of "Israeli apartheid" and urge the LGBT community to promote boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel. It is imperative that we do not stand idly by and let QuAIA's hostile messaging once again infiltrate the parade. Whether you are straight or gay, we need your support to stand up against hatred and intolerance and bring Pride back to what it once was – a safe and welcoming space for everyone.

Perhaps you support Israel and have considered coming to march with us, but you have stayed away due to your own fear or prejudice against the gay community. Marching with Kulanu Toronto may help shed some of those fears. Come join us. After all, many of us are your daughters, sons, mothers, fathers, friends and colleagues. Gay or straight, we all belong in the colourful mosaic called the Jewish community. Join us on Sunday as we march for a positive, hate-free parade. Together, let us show pride in our commitment to the shared values of dignity, diversity and freedom.

Since 2000, Kulanu Toronto has been committed to celebrating being Jewish and gay. We provide a safe, welcoming space where people feel comfortable to be themselves. Our monthly social, educational and cultural events draw people of all ages and Jewish affiliations. Years ago, we attracted mainly university students, but our demographics have shifted to include people in their late 20s through 60s.

Our events include Shabbat dinners, pub nights, Pesach seders, and Holocaust Education Week programs. We have a close relationship with Congregation Darchei Noam, where we recently co-sponsored an LGBT Pride Arts Program, and we have enjoyed co-sponsoring films for the past two years at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival and Toronto LGBT Film and Video Festival.

Please sign up to march with Kulanu Toronto at kulanutoronto@gmail.com. Join our contingent at 1 p.m. on Sunday, July 3, at the corner of Bloor and Church streets. Look for our Israeli flags and Kulanu Toronto banner. The parade begins at 2 p.m. and ends at 4 p.m.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

CHILDREN HELPING CHILDREN

Students at Robbins Hebrew Academy's Beth Tzedec campus presented a cheque for more than $4,200 to the Hincks-Dellcrest Centre. The students chose this charity to assist its many children in need of physical and emotional help. There were many fundraising events throughout the year, including a read-a-thon, board game lunch, movie time and a "pie throw" at the annual barbecue.

Israel will not permit breach of blockade

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will not allow any ships to breach its blockade of the Gaza Strip, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told his inner cabinet yesterday, during a discussion of the Gaza-bound flotilla that was expected to set sail this week.

Security officials and Foreign Ministry representatives told the cabinet Israel has no information indicating that terrorists or those affiliated with a terror group are planning to take part in the flotilla that will try to break Israel's naval blockade of the Gaza Strip, a government source said. Nonetheless, there may be clashes between Israeli forces and some Arab activists aboard the ships.

Some 10 ships are planning to set sail, mostly from Greece. The government and the army are hoping the ships will stop on their own, possibly early Thursday, and that the Israel Navy will not have to board them, a move that would not be well received in the world. Some 500 people are expected to be aboard the flotilla.

The Greek government is trying to stop its citizens from joining the international flotilla.

The Greek authorities have been asked by Israel and the United States to hold up the flotilla as long as possible. Assuming the ships do sail from Greece, they will meet two or three that have already set sail from Spain and France, and continue toward the Gaza coast.

The announcement two weeks ago from the Turkish group IHH that it will not take part in the flotilla has changed the security establishment's views on the anticipated resistance. IHH members violently resisted the naval takeover of the Mavi Marmara in the flotilla of May 2010, and nine of them were killed in the clashes. In addition, since the Mavi Marmara won't be part of this flotilla, only smaller ships will be involved, increasing the likelihood that Israel will not have to board them to force them to turn back.

Government and defence sources said that since most, if not all, the flotilla participants will be European peace activists and presumably not interested in violence, this will present a "more difficult public diplomacy challenge," and Israel wants to avoid clashes with the activists.

In contrast to the decision last year to deploy naval commandos onboard the ships when they ignored Israeli warnings not to continue to Gaza, this year Israel will try other methods to stop the ships and direct them toward Egypt's El Arish port.

The navy has, however, trained for scenarios involving violent resistance and forcible takeover of the ships, but this is considered a last resort. In such a case, the ships and passengers will be brought to a special security area at Ashdod Port.

Flotilla organizers have been informed that if they dock first at Ashdod, Israel will bring the humanitarian aid directly to Gaza, a government source in Jerusalem said.

Greece, which has growing ties with Israel, said in a statement from its Foreign Ministry that while it is against the blockade of Gaza and the use of violence to prevent ships from reaching the coastal strip, "taking into consideration the appeal of the United Nations General Secretary, we encourage Greek citizens as well as ships under Greek registry not to take part in the new flotilla headed to Gaza." The flotilla will not help the humanitarian situation, the statement said.

Israel welcomed the Greek Foreign Ministry statement.

Greek activists have called their group A Ship to Gaza and have portrayed themselves as defenders of human rights and democracy throughout the region.

However, A Ship to Gaza has reportedly proven to be a political movement of extreme left-wing Greek activists and anarchist sympathizers who support terrorist groups such as Hamas, have allied themselves with extremist Muslim-Turkish organizations and lend legitimacy to authoritarian regimes like Iran. The activists have not hidden their opposition to the recent improvement in the relations among Greece, Israel and Cyprus.

Vangelis Pissias, the head of A Ship to Gaza, in a February interview with the Greek public television station ET-3, voiced his strong opposition to the improvement in Greco-Israeli ties and praised attempts to derail them. He said the new flotilla is "part of this effort."

Greek media have come out in support of the ministry's statement, including outlets that have traditionally been anti-Israel.

In related news, acclaimed British writer Howard Jacobson criticized fellow novelist Alice Walker for her planned participation in the upcoming flotilla to Gaza.

"Whatever its cargo, by luring the Israeli military into action which can be represented as brutal, the flotilla is engaged in an entirely political act," Jacobson wrote in an essay published Friday on CNN's website. "To call it by any other name is the grossest hypocrisy."

Walker, the American author of The Color Purple and other books, had explained her participation in the flotilla in an article for CNN earlier in the week.

"Our boat, The Audacity of Hope, will be carrying letters to the people of Gaza. Letters expressing solidarity and love. That is all its cargo will consist of. If the Israeli military attacks us, it will be as if they attacked the mailman," Walker wrote.

She said she wanted "justice and respect" for Palestinian children. "One child must never be set above another," she wrote.

Jacobson, who won the prestigious Man Booker Prize last year for his novel The Finkler Question, which tackled themes relating to antisemitism, Jewish identity and Israel, responded: "Gaza is under siege, Israelis will tell you, because weapons are fired from it into Israel, threatening the lives of Israeli children."

He added that "if the aim of the flotilla is to ensure that one child will not be set above another, it is hard to see how challenging the blockade will achieve it. All an Israeli parent will see is a highly charged emotionalism disguising an action that, by its very partiality, chooses the Palestinian child over the Israeli."

PERES SMELLS THE ROSES AT TOMORROW CONFERENCE

Israeli President Shimon Peres smells the roses at an exhibition last week at Hebrew University of Jerusalem. The exhibit was part of the president's Tomorrow Conference. Carmi Gillon, vice-president for foreign relations of Hebrew University, is behind Peres.

The third annual Israeli Presidential Conference in Jerusalem closed with an impassioned message from Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu who challenged Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to "have the guts" to face his people, and tell them that he will "accept the Jewish state."

The conference, called Facing Tomorrow, attracted more than 3,500 people and presented lectures from politicians, scholars, religious and community leaders, and even celebrities on topics that ranged from the global economy, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Israel and the Diaspora and Jewish identity.

Although the Facing Tomorrow theme suggested that the speakers – including Israeli President Shimon Peres, former UK prime minister Tony Blair, Kadima Party leader Tzipi Livni, Wikipedia founder Jimmy Wales, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, sexologist Dr. Ruth Westheimer, pop music star Shakira and comedian Sarah Silverman – would give predictions and present ideas that looked to the future, many, including the prime minister, simply rehashed old ideas.

September UN Gambit still in works

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Palestinians will seek membership as an independent state at the United Nations in September even if peace negotiations with Israel are underway, the Palestinian UN envoy said last week.

Riyad Mansour said the Palestinians are working on three separate tracks: restarting negotiations, completing the institutions for an independent state and gaining additional recognition for a Palestinian state.

"If we succeed in opening the door for negotiations, we're not going to stop from attaining what belongs to us as Palestinians in this General Assembly starting on Sept. 20," Mansour told reporters after the Security Council's monthly meeting on the Mideast. "Whether we succeed in the negotiations or we don't, the other two tracks are continuing."

Mansour dismissed speculation that the Palestinians would decide against taking action to promote an independent Palestinian state and UN membership at the annual gathering of world leaders and ministers at the General Assembly.

Some Palestinians have said privately that the project is problematic and promises a messy and unclear outcome that could change little on the ground - and might backfire politically or even spark new violence if Palestinians emerge disappointed with the result.

UN membership requires a recommendation from the Security Council – which means no veto by the United States, Israel's closest ally – and approval by two-thirds of the General Assembly, or 128 countries. The United States has repeatedly said there should be a negotiated peace settlement between Israel and the Palestinians before Palestine becomes a UN member state.

Earlier this month, U.S. officials told a visiting Palestinian delegation that seeking UN recognition in the absence of a peace deal was a "non-starter" – the latest indication the United States would veto a resolution at the Security Council.

Israel's UN Ambassador Ron Prosor told reporters that "doing anything unilateral would not be constructive."

The Palestinians insist they will not resume peace talks until Israel stops building settlements in the West Bank and East Jerusalem – lands that Israel took control of during the Six Day War in 1967 and that the Palestinians want for their future state. Israel maintains that the Palestinians should not set conditions for talks and that settlements didn't stop them negotiating in the past.

Mansour criticized Israel for refusing to halt settlement building and agree to resume negotiations based on 1967 borders, with agreed land swaps, as U.S. President Barack Obama has endorsed.

Prosor said "I think both sides are working together now to find ways to go into direct negotiations."

"I know that unilateral steps don't bring anything constructive, but on the contrary," he said, "so we all should try and work as much as we can with the time that we have in order to set down with the difficult issues that we still have to address."

Mansour wouldn't say exactly what the Palestinians will do at the United Nations in September. Asked when the Palestinians would submit an application for UN membership to Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, he replied: "When we are ready."

He predicted that more than two-thirds of the 192 UN member states would recognize an independent Palestinian state before September, up from "around 120" countries at present.

"Then, we want to know if there is a position in the Security Council of depriving us of our natural right and legal right to join the community of nations as a state," he said. "What would be the argument if more than two-thirds of nations are supporting us in that endeavour?"

Mansour said he believes this year the Palestinians are facing "a historic moment" because the international community "is sick and tired of the continuation of this conflict."

"No one can stop the wheel of history that is rotating," he said. "They want to see it ending – and it has to be ending on the basis of an independent Palestinian state on the borders of 1967 with east Jerusalem as its capital."

Iran denies involvement in suppressing Syria protests

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran accused the European Union of "distorting reality" on Sunday after the bloc slapped sanctions on the Syrian leadership and three high-ranking Iranian officials the EU said was helping Damascus crush dissent.

Alongside extended sanctions on Syria, the EU added three commanders of Iran's Revolutionary Guards – accused of supporting Syrian President Bashar Assad's suppression of anti-government protests – to a blacklist that imposes travel restrictions and freezes assets. "The EU's baseless claim linking Iran's Revolutionary Guards with Syrian events shows its attempt to target propaganda against the Islamic Republic and to distort reality," Iran's Foreign Ministry spokesman Ramin Mehmanparast said in a statement.

He denied Tehran was interfering in Syria's internal affairs, saying, "The government and people of Syria enjoy the political and social maturity to resolve their domestic problems."

Iran, which crushed its own anti-government protests after the contested re-election of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in 2009, has voiced support for uprisings in most of the Arab world, except in Syria, which has what Iran sees as a "line of resistance" against Israel. Both support militant groups Hamas and Hezbollah.

As part of a drive led by Washington to further isolate Iran, which it believes is developing nuclear weapons, the United States blacklisted a major Iranian port operator and its national airline, Iran Air, last Thursday.

The U.S. Treasury said Iran Air and its Iran Air Tours subsidiary had on numerous occasions transported military-related equipment on behalf of the government, including missiles, rockets and titanium sheets, a dual-use material that can be used in advanced weapons systems.

Iran Air chief executive Farhad Parvaresh called the sanctions "ineffective and useless."

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

"Imposing sanctions against Iran's aviation is not something new. It is more than 30 years that Iran Air does not have any flights to America," he was quoted as saying by Sharq daily.

The sanctions on Iran Air could increase difficulties in the airline's operations that started last year when airports in many western countries stopped refuelling its planes because of U.S. sanctions prohibiting the export of refined petroleum products to Iran.

Tehran denies it is seeking nuclear weapons and says it wants atomic technology for power and other peaceful purposes.

Apple removes intifadah app

Apple Inc. removed the Arabic-language "Thirdintifada" application from its App Store following a request from the Israeli government. The application was removed last week a day after Israel's minister of public diplomacy and Diaspora affairs, Yuli Edelstein, wrote to Apple founder and CEO Steve Jobs making the request. "We removed this app from the App Store because it violates the developer guidelines by being offensive to large groups of people," an Apple spokesperson said Wednesday evening. The Thirdintifada application, which had been available for free download from the App Store, updates users on anti-Israel protests or allows them to organize their own. It also features anti-Israel articles and photos of terrorists who have attacked Israel or Israelis. Edelstein, who in his letter to Jobs had called the application "anti-Israel and anti-Zionist," commended the decision in a statement issued Thursday morning. "By its action, Apple has proven, as Facebook did, that it shares the values that oppose violence, incitement and terrorism." In March, Edelman appealed to Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg to remove a page called "Third Intifada" that called for a new uprising against Israel. The page subsequently was removed, though copycat pages arose in its place.

Mt. of Olives graves vandalized

More than a dozen graves at the Mount of Olives cemetery in Jerusalem were vandalized, the latest in a series of attacks on one of Judaism's oldest cemeteries. On June 14, some 14 graves were damaged by Arab youths wielding sledgehammers, according to private security guards stationed at the cemetery in eastern Jerusalem. The damage was in addition to vandalism sustained at the cemetery last month on Nakba Day when Arabs mark the declaration of the State of Israel. During riots, Palestinians hurled large rocks and boulders toward the graves, chipping and breaking at least 15. Arab youths also vandalized or destroyed nearly 40 newly installed surveillance cameras in the cemetery, according to the international committee for the preservation of Har HaZeitim (Mount of Olives). At the same time, local Arabs began illegally expanding a mosque to within 15 feet of the grave of prime minister Menachem Begin, according to the committee.

In the last year, efforts of the committee have resulted in the restoration of 2,000 of an estimated 40,000 graves that were destroyed before 1967 under Jordanian rule, an increased private security presence and the installation of 50 surveillance cameras and fluorescent lighting. There are an estimated 150,000 graves on the mount, where Jews have been buried since biblical times.

Prison conditions hardened

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced last week that he plans to toughen the conditions of Palestinian security prisoners in Israel's prisons. "I have decided to change Israel's treatment of terrorists sitting in prison," Netanyahu said. "We will give them all that they deserve according to international law but nothing beyond that. We will stop, among other things, the absurd practice in which terrorists who murdered innocent people enrol in academic studies. There will be no more 'doctors of terror' – the celebration is over." Netanyahu's comments come after Hamas refused Thursday to answer the International Red Cross' request that the Gaza rulers provide proof that abducted Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit is still alive.

Banjos make the boy

Cary Fagan is a Toronto-based novelist and children's writer who happens to play mandolin in a bluegrass band. It may come as a surprise to his readers that he has also been known to build banjos in his spare time.

In the author's note at the back of Banjo of Destiny (Groundwood), his new novel for young readers, he tells us: "The wood for the first banjo that I made came from a broken Ikea chair. For the third and most recent one, I used wood that I found in the garage of our house... For one I used a handdrum that looked something like a large tambourine."

These are not stray details, since Jeremiah Birnbaum, the child at the centre of Banjo of Destiny, does something similar, though his materials happen to include hardware scavenged from a wrecked plastic child's guitar.

Norman Ravvin

Banjo of Destiny is a light-hearted fable with very contemporary concerns. Jeremiah is the son of too-rich parents, who aim to expand their young son's future possibilities by offering him too much of everything. He takes ballroom dancing lessons. He is a student at Fernwood Academy, where courses include "culinary arts" and "industrial design." And he sits for excruciating piano lessons with the pompous Maestro Boris, who responds to Jeremiah's poor recital performances by telling him he has "no soul."

Jeremiah's story is, in the most indirect way, a Jewish one. His parents are successes with modest beginnings; the mother as a hot dog cart cook and the father once toiled as a window cleaner. Since his "parents had grown up with so little," Jeremiah understands why they want "the best for him." Even more, they would like him to be a "gentleman," a more naturally polished version of themselves.

Although Banjo of Destiny is not set in a recognizable locale, this element might remind a Toronto reader of a photograph of Ed Mirvish, which hung prominently in his Bloor Street store, decked out as a "proper" Englishman. (Another book by Fagan that makes more overt use of Toronto's Jewish backstreets is the picture book Ten Old Men and a Mouse, set in the Kensington Market area).

Banjo of Destiny makes light fun of private-school life, and of the way kids take verbal potshots at one another. Cooking class reminds Jeremiah of the homemade concoction he offered the family chauffeur an opportunity to sample – his "Tuna-Pea Soup-Chile Pepper-Chocolate Surprise." But the novel takes on heft and greater seriousness the day Jeremiah stumbles upon an abandoned farmhouse in the wheat fields beyond his school grounds. There, like an apparition out of a folk song, sits "an elderly black man, tall and slim, with a moustache. His steel-gray hair was trimmed short. He wore a white shirt with a pinstriped vest. His trousers were pulled up at the knees, showing his argyle socks and well-polished shoes. His suit jacket had been folded and laid neatly over the porch rail."

The old man plays a banjo, the sound of which captivates Jeremiah. With great dedication and the help of his streetwise schoolmate Luella, Jeremiah builds his own banjo. Fagan's way with this material is inspiring – the reader feels convinced he could make a do-it-yourself banjo using the few pages of instructions offered.

Once the instrument is finished, Jeremiah finds it no easy challenge to force music out of it, but eventually he does gain a repertoire, entering a world of unusual songs that reveal what it means to really love to immerse oneself in something.

Fagan makes subtle use of his story's fable-like message, and there is no cloying lesson to be had in the final pages of Banjo of Destiny. One can feel, instead, the joy some people gain from making a thing, from making music, and from sharing these things with others. One feels, too, the change in Jeremiah that such discoveries bring.

Banjo of Destiny is nicely illustrated by Paris-based artist Selçuk Demirel, whose style, especially on the book's cover, is reminiscent of both the best of European poster art and the perennial New Yorker artist, Sempé.

There is much that parents and their kids can share in the novel, a quality not easily found in books aimed at adolescents.

Norman Ravvin's new novel is The Joyful Child, from Gaspereau Press. He is chair of the Concordia Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

HomeSAV caters to bargain-hunting hipsters

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

One of the characteristics of entrepreneurs is that they don't complain about a gap in the marketplace, they do something about it.

That's what three 30-something professionals did. They brainstormed a business model designed to make shopping for home furnishings and children's products easier for busy people like themselves.

Enter HomeSAV, a web-based shopping club that offers mid- to high-end products at significant discounts, along with home delivery.

Launched less than a year ago, the concept has proven quite popular, said Aliza Pulver, who, along with Allen Fisch and Alex Norman, created the company.

At last count, membership, which is free, closed in on 100,000 and is growing at the rate of 30 per cent per month. The firm's website registers in the range of 700,000 page views per month and HomeSAV has relationships with more than 500 quality brands.

"We've come a long way since we started," said Pulver, who was a real estate lawyer before going into business.

The online discount purchasing club has proven a hit for the company's targeted demographic of 28- to 45-year-olds, which takes in first or second home buyers. Manufacturers have warmed to the firm's ability to provide a coveted demographic, Pulver said.

Their business model has been compared to a "Groupon of home décor." Here's how it works: shoppers browse the company's website and become members.

Allen Fisch, left, Aliza Pulver, centre and Alex Norman

New product offerings are forwarded to members' e-mail addresses. There are 30 products available daily and they are offered for four days only.

"People are much more used to shopping online for every product," she said.

A recent visit to the website highlighted Kalorik "sleek small appliances," Van Teal lighting, KidKraft playsets and DK Living "contemporary décor," among other products.

"With our purchasing power, we're able to negotiate discount prices," Pulver said.

"We move a large volume of products for our suppliers and do a great job of catering to our demographic... We bring savvy (hence HomeSAV, as in HomeSavvy), fashionable people looking for hip products, but who don't have the time to shop for them," she added.

"We've become really good at curating and finding great products."

Visitors to the website can scroll through high-resolution images and check out the products from different angles, "so you feel like you're shopping in a store."

Once a product is selected, it's delivered right to the customer's door. To date, the return rate has been less than one per cent, Pulver said.

The North American market for furniture and home furnishings is $124 billion a year, and HomeSAV provides an easy way to make a purchase without having to go store to store. Prior to starting the business, the partners were becoming frustrated about furnishing their own homes. They were leading busy lives, advancing their careers and starting families.

"We found it unbelievably time consuming and expensive to furnish the house," Pulver said.

Bringing their particular skills to the table – Norman worked in the online space, Fisch had experience in the furniture business, Pulver was a buyer – they started HomeSAV. At first, they dealt with end-of-line items, but as the business proved successful, they added more high-end products. Manufacturers are now testing the popularity of products with HomeSAV even before they're offered at retail outlets, Pulver said, adding that manufacturers are also pleased with the online traffic at their own websites generated by HomeSAV members.

HomeSAV currently employs nine people other than the partners, and they recently expanded into the United States.

"I do think we've broken new ground," Pulver said. "At times, young people who are working hard don't have the time to get these products.

"We want to educate end users and make it easier to shop for high end products."

El Al staff in strike position

Compiled by CJN Staff

Unionized workers at El Al Airlines in Toronto have voted to give their bargaining committee a strike mandate.

The El Al employees, members of the United Steelworkers (USW), provide marketing, sales and reservations services from the airline's offices in downtown Toronto.

"Negotiations have been ongoing since our last contract expired on Dec. 31, 2010," said Jacob Mazgaonkar, Steelworkers bargaining committee member and unit chair for the El Al workers.

Dinah Kutner, general manager of the airline's Canadian office, said "we're still negotiating.

"Every three years we negotiate. This time it's taking longer to come to an agreement."

Kutner said nine employees are affected, seven in the office and two at the airport. The two sides are "not far" apart, she said, adding that flights to and from Israel would not be affected in the event of a strike.

According to Mazgaonkar, a request for assistance has been made to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and the union is hoping the agency can help the parties resolve the impasse and avoid a labour dispute, he added.
